PREFACE OF THE EDITOR.

SOME apology may seem required for the publication of these Memoirs. The editor indeed trusts that no one will suspect him of proposing their hero as a model, his actions as examples, or his principles as praiseworthy: but he would not even willingly be supposed to present scenes—too frequently of vice—merely for the sake of affording an idle and unprofitable pastime. His aim is not wholly frivolous. In an age in which whatever relates to the regions once adorned by the Greeks, and since defaced by the Turks, excites peculiar attention, he thought that this narrative might add to our information on so interesting a subject, not only by presenting a picture of national customs and manners, but by offering many historical and biographical notices not to be met with elsewhere, and yet, as far as their accuracy has been investigated, narrated with scrupulous regard to truth:—for though the author has probably brought forward under the mask of fictitious names, the persons and adventures of some private individuals, whom he might not have deemed himself warranted to drag before the public undisguised, he seems to have described public events and personages with all the fidelity of an historian. Unfortunately, the weeds in his work are so closely interwoven with its flowers, that only some of the rankest among the former could be plucked out without detriment to the latter.

The MS. being ill written and full of erasures, some names of persons and places may have been mistaken; and in all of them it was extremely difficult to alter the original orthography to that which in English would produce the same sounds. As a great part of the language was moreover in a familiar tone, and full of idiomatic and proverbial expressions, a still greater difficulty occurred in the necessity of rendering these by such English equivalents as might convey the sense, and render it intelligible to the English reader, without wholly destroying the Eastern turn of the style, and the French, and Greek, and Turkish peculiarities of phrase, in which the narrative abounds.

For the explanation of such Turkish words or allusions to Eastern customs as might be least generally understood, the editor has added a few notes, conveying what little information he has been able to collect, respecting the constantly shifting scene of action to which we are conveyed by the restless writer of these unvarnished confessions.

CHAPTER I.

My family came originally from Epirus: my father settled at Chio. His parentage was neither exalted nor yet low. In his own opinion, he could boast of purer blood than any of the Palæologi, the Cantacusenes, and the Comneni of the present day. "These mongrel descendants," he used to observe, "of Greeks, Venetians, and Genoese had only picked up the fine names they flourished about in, when the real owners dropped off: he wore his own;" and Signor Sotiri saw no reason why he should not, when he went forth into public, toss his head, swing his jubbee* like a pendulum from side to side, and shuffle along in his papooshes, with all the airs of quality.

This worthy man combined in his single person the various characters of diplomatist, husbandman, merchant, manufacturer, and master of a privateer. To be more explicit, he was drogouman† to the French consul at Chio; in town he kept a silk-loom at work; in the country he had a plantation of agrumi;‡ he exported his stuffs and fruits to the principal seaports in the Archipelago; and in the first Russian war, he employed all his spare money in fitting out a small vessel to cruise against the enemy—for so he chose to consider the Russians, in spite of all their amicable professions towards the Greeks. As a loyal subject of the Porte, and an old servant of the French government, he felt no sort of wish to be delivered from the yoke of the Turks, and he looked upon those barbarians of the North, who cared no more for the patriarch of Constantinople than for the pope of Rome, as little better than rank heretics, not worthy of being treated even like his silkworms, which every year he got carefully exorcised before their spinning time. I however remember, when a child, some buzz in the family, about my father's partner in the privateer—an Ipsariote reis*—having one day made a mistake in capturing under the rocks of Jura a rich Turkish vessel, which he went and sold to the Russians themselves, then stationed at Paros. Signor Sotiri shook his head at this intelligence, as if he did not approve of the transaction, and observed, "the less that was said about it, the better." I suppose, therefore, it was out of sheer humanity, that he preferred receiving his share of the prize money, to the sterile and barbarous satisfaction of hanging his associate.

Much improved in his circumstances by this untoward accident, my father would have given up his interpretation. Besides rendering him more or less dependent, it was uncomfortable, in so far as, being very deaf, he never heard what it was his business to translate. But my mother liked the title of droguemaness. She had never heard of the necessity of a drogueman reporting speeches as he received them; and she reminded her husband how essential the protection of the French mission might be to some of his Greek speculations.

My mother was a native of Naxos, and esteemed a great heiress in her country. She possessed an estate of three hundred piastres a-year, clear, managed by a relation of her own, Marco Politi; very wealthy himself, primate of all the Greek villages of the island, and a very great rogue.

My brothers and sisters—and there came, one by one, just three of each—all contrived to take precedence of me at their birth, and consequently throughout the whole of their subsequent lives. The punctilio of the thing I should not have minded; but, among my countrymen, a foolish family pride exhausts people's fortunes during their lifetime in portioning their daughters: the elder sons ran away with what remained, and poor Anastasios brought up the rear with but an indifferent prospect. My kind parents, however, determined to make up for leaving me destitute at their death, by spoiling me as much as possible during their lives.

My eldest sister (I begin, as is proper, with the ladies) married a physician of the country graduated at Padua. Robust as a hamal,† and never until her marriage having known a moment's illness, Epiphania seemed to bid defiance to her husband's utmost skill in medicine. But she was not proof against her own imaginations. Signor Sozimo expressed such constant anxiety about his "dear wife's" precious health, and gave her so much viper broth to keep up her strength, that she soon began to fancy herself in a bad way; and died at last of the mere apprehension of not living.

My sister Roxana, who would have been a beauty but for a scar, which she chose to call a dimple, at an early age fell desperately in love with a Turk; and, spite of all the remonstrances of her friends, bestowed her hand upon this unbeliever. Nor was it until the very last of her offended relations had been prevailed upon to grant her an unlimited pardon, that she became conscious of the heinousness of her crime, and began to feel an unconquerable desire to re-enter the pale of our holy communion. This she at length effected, by never ceasing to bewail her apostacy, until her husband, in disgust, allowed her a divorce. Immediately she flew back at once into the arms of the church, and into those of a young Greek, who, an effective instrument in her reformation, obliterated every trace of her first unhallowed wedlock, by a more canonical union. He truly laboured for the church; for he was by trade an agiographis, or painter of saints; and connoisseurs esteemed him the Apelles of our district in that line. His spouse sat for all his Virgins; and accordingly as she behaved well or ill, he used to paint them handsome or ugly: a practice which kept her very much upon her good behaviour. She was conceited about her looks, and wasted as much paint upon her cheeks as her husband did upon his canvass; a circumstance, however, which produced a striking resemblance between the portraits and the original.

As to my youngest sister, she deemed a two years' obedience, well or ill performed, to a single lord and master, quite trial enough for a woman in this world. Her husband dying, she took the habit of a caloyera,* in a nunnery near the delightful district of the Lentises. There, the interest of her portion, together with the produce of her handiwork, enabled her to set up, according to the practice of our religious communities, an independent establishment; and to entertain her friends, of both sexes, in a manner at once comfortable and decorous.

* Caloyera—a nun, as caloyer means a friar.

What shall I say of my brothers? The eldest was a loose and dissipated youth. To cure him of his extravagance, my father had him nailed to the desk of the strictest merchant of Smyrna. The consequence was, that instead of the clerk staying at home, desk, contents, and all followed him out of doors; until, in a notorious tavern, the well-tempered Brescia blade of a Zantiote captain put an end to his prowess, and saved him the mortification of being returned on our hands as a hopeless profligate. Of all the family I felt the most grieved for his loss. He had a dark complexion, and a fine, commanding figure. I looked upon Theodore with a certain veneration, as the prop of the house; and had purposed some day to take him for my model.

The dove is not more distinguished from the gamecock, than differed from the noisy blustering Theodore the sly demure Eustathius, destined to succeed my father in his place of drogueiman. A sleek, smoth-spoken, sanctified lad, with a round face and a red and white complexion, Eustathius, besides that little treasure his own dear self, which he always kept with the utmost care, valued but one other thing in this world, namely, money. Of this, after a long courtship, he had the good fortune, through dint of unabating perseverance, to marry a prodigious heap, encumbered, however, with a wary widow its mistress, who, after four distinct refusals, at last condescended to accept my brother as her slave, under the name of her husband. But the chains Eustathius wore were of massy gold; and all he wanted was the pleasure of contemplating their glitter.

Constantine, my third brother, managed the farm. This hopeful youth, only a few years older than myself, used to hate me with singular asperity; though I never could account for it, except that he was crooked, and I, unfortunately, straight: an offence, however, which so many others shared with me, that he must have hated the whole human race—as perhaps he did. It is true, I much aggravated my crime by one day observing, on his talking slightly of the advantages of a handsome person, that “they were what none affected to despise, except such as could not make good their claim to them;”—I thought he would have stabbed me.

After all the rest of the brood had taken wing, I remained alone at home, to solace my parents. Too fond of their favourite to damp my youthful spirits by fitting me for a profession, they kindly put off from day to day every species of instruction, probably, till I should beg for it; which my discretion forbade. Unfortunately, nature chose not, in the mean time, to be equally dilatory with my parents; and from an angel of an infant, I by degrees became a great lubberly boy, without any other accomplishment but that of flogging my top with the left hand, while with the right I despatched my sign of the cross: for in some things I understood the value of time. My parents, as may be supposed, were great sticklers for punctuality in every sort of devout practice; mass-going, confession, lent observance, &c. Of moral duties—less tangible in their nature—they had, poor souls, but a vague and confused notion; and the criminality of actions, in reference to one's neighbour, they taught me chiefly to estimate according to the greater or smaller risk connected with them of incurring the bastinado from the Turks. As to manual correction at the hands of my own father, it seemed so desirable a circumstance, from the ample amends my mother never failed to make me for her husband's cruelty to her poor boy, that my only despair was at being able to obtain it so seldom.

Having contented themselves for a reasonable number of years with wistfully contemplating—the drogueman my active make and well set limbs, and the drogue-maness my dark eyes, ruddy cheeks, and raven locks—they at last began to ponder how they might turn these gifts to the best advantage. Both agreed that something should be done, but neither knew exactly what; and the one never proposed a profession, which the other did not immediately object to—until an old relation stepped in between and recommended the church as a never-failing resource to those who can think of no other. My cousin had set the example by making his own son a little caloyer at twelve. Prohibited by the Turks from the trade of a soldier, and by my parents from that of a sailor, I myself saw nothing better, and agreed to the proposal. It now became necessary to give me a smattering of learning, and I was put under the tuition of a teacher of the Hellenic language, who assumed the title of logiotatos, and only averred himself inferior to Demosthenes out of sheer modesty. My idleness got the better of my preceptor's learning and diligence. All the gold that flowed from the lips of St. Chrysostom, his favourite, could not, to my taste, gild the bitter pill of his lessons; and even Homer, much as I liked fighting out of doors, found but an indifferent welcome in school hours. The truth is, I had a dislike to reading in the abstract; but when away from my books I affected a great admiration for Achilles; called him—in reference to Epirus the land of my ancestors—my countryman; and regretted that I was not born two thousand years ago, for none but to be his Patroclus. In my fits of heroism I swore to treat the Turks as he had done the Trojans. For a time dreamed of nothing but putting to the sword the whole seraglio—dwarfs, eunuchs, and all. These dreams my parents highly admired, but advised me not to divulge. “Just rancour,” they said, “should be kept up to give it more strength.”—Upon this principle they cringed to the ground to every Moslem* they met.

The inclinations of the little fellow least for the church militant meantime began to appear more prominently. I had collected a troop of ragamuffins of my own age, of whom I got myself dubbed captain; purloined from my uncle, the painter, one of his most smirking Madonnas for a banner; and under the auspices of the Panagia† set about robbing orchards, and laying under contribution the villagers, with all the devotion imaginable. So great was the terror our crusades inspired, that the sufferers durst not even complain, except in a body. Whenever, as chief of the band, I became the marked object of animadversion, I kept out of the way until my father had paid the damage, and sued my pardon for his backwardness in doing so. Once, indeed, when tired of my pranks, he swore I would be his ruin, I begged he would quiet his fears, by granting me an unlimited leave of absence; pledging myself not to return till doomsday. This was too much for him. Sooner than part with his Anastasius, he would have bribed the peasants beforehand to suffer all my depredations.

Thus early disposed and trained to the business of titling, my father felt a little surprised when, on the eve of taking orders, I begged to be excused. For the first time in his life, Signor Sotiri insisted on implicit obedience; but that first time came too late. I made it the last, by swearing that if he forced me to take the mitre* I would clap over it a turban. He gave way, and contented himself with quietly asking what I finally meant to do. "Nothing," was the answer of my heart: but the profession of doing nothing requires ample means. I therefore pretended a wish to learn trade. My father forthwith wrote to a Sr. merchant of his acquaintance to receive me into his counting-house.

Meantime I found an employment for my leisure hours, which put an end to all childish pastimes. Signor Sotiri, though, as before-mentioned, a little hard of hearing, wanted not fluency in speech. His oratory had chiefly been exerted to render his patron dumb. He constantly represented how absolutely the dignity of his station forbade his having the least conversation with the natives. Now incumbent upon him it was, though born in the Levant, to appear not to understand a single word of its idioms. By this device he kept all the speculating himself; and in truth, with the Turks in office, at all times more prone than strict politeness permits to compliment the representatives of Christian powers with the titles of "infidel, yaoor,† Christian dog," &c., and at this particular juncture more than usually out of humour in consequence of the Russian war,‡ this was often the only way to save the consular pride from some little rubs, other wise unavoidable in the necessary intercourse with the government. Hence Mr. de M—— not only never stirred from home without his interpreter by his side, but had him constantly at his elbow within doors; and made him the sole channel of all his official transactions: a circumstance which my father perfectly knew how to turn to the best advantage.

I too, in my capacity as the drogueman's chief assistant and messenger, was in daily attendance at the consular mansion; which proved useful to me in one respect, as it gave me an opportunity of learning the French language, and that with the greater fluency, from the circumstance of no one offering expressly to teach me. The old consul having, between his dignity with the Greeks and his punctilio with the Turks, but little society, I soon became, by the sprightliness of my repartees, a very great favourite. Mr. de M—— not only encouraged me to take a part in conversation, but would even condescend to laugh most heartily both at my witticisms and my practical jokes, whenever neither himself, nor his servants, nor his relations, nor his friends, nor his protégés, were in the least implicated in them, or made to feel the consequences.

Mr. de M—— had an only daughter, the blue-eyed Helena, the child of his old age. Deprived of a mother's watchful care, this lovely girl was allowed in her father's house an unrestrained latitude, and availed herself of her privilege with all the freedom of unsuspecting innocence. Her father, without being fond of music, loved the sound of an instrument. The daughter had been taught the harpsichord; but, full of life and spirits, she hated the mechanical drudgery of running over the cold, clumsy keys of a huge cumbrous fixture, to which the performer, she thought, looked a mere appendage. Our light portable lyre, which the arms so gracefully encircle, and the fingers touch so lightly, she would learn to play upon most readily—could she but find a proper master. "Who more so," thought I, "than the son of the father's interpreter?" and forthwith offered my services. Though but a moderate performer, I had the advantage of always being at hand, and without being positively either accepted or refused, was soon employed.

Parents! who do not particularly wish your daughters to fall in love with the teachers, above all things avoid admitting under your roof any music masters, except such as are antidotes to that passion. Where harmony alone is to rule the sense, how can souls remain unattuned to each other? The boy's hand, in guiding the taper fingers of his pupil, will sometimes make them stray from her chords to his heart, and mistake for the vibrations of the one, the pulsations of the other. The very lips of the fair one, accustomed to re-echo the sounds of her teacher's voice, will by degrees respond to his feelings; and he who has so many means of disclosing his passion, and of insinuating a reciprocal warmth, without any imputation of forwardness, or breach of respect, will be more anxious to interpret the sounds he utters than to disavow their sense.

For my part, I almost immediately felt my heart on fire, and soon Helena too caught the consuming flame. Nothing could tear us away from each other. The duets, begun in the heat of the day within doors, were repeated in the cool of the evening on the stone seat before the house. Sighs interrupted the songs: and when the advancing night forced Helena to retire, her blue eyes looked like drooping violets steeped in dew.

The consul had destined his little favourite, as soon as arrived at a suitable age, to a rich young Smyrniote, nephew to his correspondent. He dreamed not of the possibility of her falling in love with a Greek boy, habited in the dress of the country, and the son of his interpreter. It was rather a gratification to him, on seeing us so much together, to think that in her solitude she should have found the harmless pastime of our concerts.

My father saw deeper into the business. Had he conceived it likely to end in a marriage, and that marriage likely to bring his family any accession of weight or of fortune, he would, I make no doubt, have become as blind as he was deaf; but this he by no means thought probable. The old consul was a good deal distressed; his salary must cease with his life, and he had nothing to leave his daughter at his death but his consular pride; "and with that portion," observed my father, "she might indeed become a gem of the first water in the hands of a rich Smyrna merchant, who would set her in gold, but round our bare necks she could only prove a millstone." He therefore warned me against carrying the intimacy too far.

His caution came too late. The less experience my pupil at first brought to her lessons, the more rapid was the progress she made under my tuition. Love's fullest harmony was struck, almost ere she suspected it whispered in our sighs. Indeed, so much was she still in the first spring of her innocence, that she scarce seemed aware that in due time blossoms turned to fruits, until taught by experience. Then only she grew frightened, and at first sobbed incessantly; but by degrees, persuading herself that our attachment, when divulged, must end in our permanent union, she recovered a kind of composure, and resolved to let the discovery take its course; neither hastening the disclosure, nor yet trying to avert it, and rather rejoicing than dismayed that the slim Perote* dress which she wore for the sake of consular dignity must betray the secret of her father's villa sooner than the ample involutions of which our females so well know the advantages.

I by no means sympathized in this calmness, or agreed in these wishes. What the too-confiding Helena looked upon as the harbour in which her inquietudes must end, my father had taught me to consider as the quicksand on which all my hopes must perish. I therefore tried to impress Helena with my utter inability to support her as my wife; and with the expedience of her enabling the consul, by a timely confession, to save her honour without my inadequate assistance.

To the fair one flushed with love the least proffer of prudential considerations is an insult. Exasperated at my discreet suggestions, Helena treated me with haughtiness—with contempt. “When she could bring herself to stoop to my lowness, did I fear any sacrifice that raised me to her level?”

Feelings such as mine could ill brook this taunting speech. To be told I was to consider as an honour beyond my deserts the penniless hand of one whose heart had attested too warmly my merits,—was this to be endured? All the blood of Achilles rose within me; I ran to the quay, and there let it rage in unison with the foaming breakers.

As long as the Smyrna scheme had remained in suspense, I saw an opening through which to escape; but my father had just received a flat refusal in that quarter. The merchant to whom he applied in my behalf, acquainted with my brother's adventures, felt little anxious for another scion of the same stock.

This disappointment had soured my father's temper, and disposed him to visit on me the sins of my brother. Having begun my education at the wrong end, by leaving me every species of latitude, when he might easily have curbed my licentious disposition, he now gave it the finishing touch equally injudiciously, by trying, after my unbridled habits had become confirmed, to restrain me even in what I considered as reasonable freedom. I now was thwarted in every wish, deprived of every indulgence; and all this, apparently, for no other fault, except that from a chubby prattling child, to be hushed with toys and sweetmeats, I had not prevented myself from growing into a slouching, thoughtful youth, who too often demanded a supply of solid cash.

My mother, too, was to me an altered woman. The moment I no longer submitted to be fondled like a baby, she transferred her affections—against all rule and precedent—from me to the one among us who had neither the claims of the youngest nor of the eldest—to Constantine. His hump had evidently operated the revolution in his favour; but whether, by making my mother wish to console him for this defect, or by causing her to consider him as endowed with an additional perfection, I never could make out. Certain it is, she used to gaze on his back as she before had done on my face, until her admiration sometimes put his own modesty to the blush.

Not habituated early enough to filial submission, I no sooner felt the weight of parental authority, than I began to question its justice; and able to derive its rights only from the voluntary concession of the child, while its feebleness forces it to barter obedience for food, I considered its continuance, when the boy, enabled to earn his own livelihood, loudly demands his liberty, as a usurpation. Long, therefore, had I been meditating to seize some opportunity of eluding the parental yoke, even before I got entangled in the snares of love. The wound which my mistress inflicted on my pride added new incentives to this resolution, and, after her mortifying speech, the only wish my mind remained capable of forming was, to abandon father, mother, mistress, friends, relations, and home for ever. Indeed, no way in which I might sever myself from Helena seemed to me unfair, when I considered the stamp of humiliating selfishness she had chosen to imprint upon my constancy.

My brain thus in a ferment, I entered the first tavern I found open; and, though by no means addicted to intemperance, drank off draught after draught of our strongest wine, until the houses in the street seemed familiarly to nod to the ships on the wave.

Among these latter lay in the road a Venetian brig, ready for its departure. While I sat pondering over my grievances, the evening breeze sprung up, and the song of the sailors on board marked the heaving of the anchor. I accepted it as the summons of putting my design into execution. Running out of the house, I was soon rowed to the vessel, and reached it just as the sails were unfurling. I offered my services to the captain. He had lost half his crew in his last Egyptian caravan;* but still would only receive me as a simple cabin-boy. The office seemed little suited to the son of a drogueman, whose garment alone, I thought, should sweep the deck; but it was not a time to bargain, and I submitted. I crept into the hold among the ballast, until we should be out of reach of pursuit, and when informed of my safety, jumped upon the deck, and ran to the stern to see what way we had made.

The moon was just rising in all her splendour, and a bar of silvery light ran across the spangled waves. The gradually increasing breeze rapidly carried us out of the straits of Chio. The different objects on the shore—mountains, valleys, villages, and steeples—seemed in swift succession, first advancing to meet us, then halting an instant opposite our vessel to greet us on our passage, and lastly, again gliding off, soon entirely to vanish away; until, launched into the open main, we saw the whole line of coast more faintly marked, and gradually disappearing in distant darkness.

Various and opposite were the feelings which, as I stood contemplating the luminous track we left in the rippling wave, agitated my bosom; but whatever direction I tried to give to my thoughts, they always reverted to Helena. In vain I sought to banish from my guilt-struck fancy her upbraiding image. As if in mockery of my endeavours, it seemed to assume a tangible shape. I persuaded myself I actually beheld the pale form of my mistress, half rising, with her hair all dishevelled, from the roaring billows, follow the fleeting ship, and with piteous moans call me back to her outstretched arms. I wished I could have staid the swift-moving mass, and have rendered, by some magic spell, the rapidly-receding keel a motionless rock on the wave, in order to enable the dear phantom to join me; or, at least, in order to have a few instants more to reflect on my conduct and to retract my errors, ere the opportunity should pass by for ever. In vain! I felt as if an uncontrollable force kept impelling me on; and at last, "It is useless," I exclaimed, "to contend! I feel it—I must yield to my destiny—I must perform the things set down for me, be they good or be they evil!"

As the dawn began to dispel the dark visions of the night, as the sun rose in all his glory to pervade the blue expanse of the heavens, and the returning day showed Chio like a faint cloud floating on the utmost verge of the waters, my thoughts assumed a brighter hue ; my heart felt the weight upon it lightened ; and the idea that I now was going to explore those distant realms which I so long had yearned after, filled me with expectation and delight.

Yet even this new joy was mixed with a terror of its own. At no period of my life had I yet outstepped the narrow pale of my native island, or obtained so much as a peep at the nearest objects beyond the straits by which it was bounded. Crossing over to the neighbouring islets seemed to me a long voyage. Smyrna had been, in my imagination, the utmost limit of the habitable globe ; and as to Europe, I deemed it to lie somewhere not far from the antipodes. The unbounded prospect of the whole wide world bursting all at once upon me struck my young heart with awe ; and the sight of nothing around me but strangers utterly unknown and indifferent to my fate was sad and appalling.

Soon, however, I was recalled from these vague and indistinct reflections by feelings more definite and more immediately connected with my present situation. I had scarce closed my eyes, when the captain, not wishing that I should have unpleasant dreams, or any dreams at all, with a familiar tap on the shoulder reminded me that it was time to begin earning my passage, and handed me over to his crew to instruct me in my task. Mine no longer were indulgent teachers ; and from being the little tyrant of my father's domestics, I now found myself the slave of every common sailor. While my companions—my masters I should say—sat down to their meals, I had to fast ; and when they slept, I must watch. Their scanty leavings were my food, and it was only now and then that I could snatch from my constant toil a few moments of hurried and broken rest. Whatever awkwardness I showed was followed by immediate blows ; nay, it became a standing joke to call me to different places at once, that I might in some incur the punishment of unavoidable delay. My appeals to the mercy or justice of those around me were treated with equal derision.

As I found it useless to complain, I stifled my feelings, and only kept watching an opportunity for escape or revenge. This made me particularly observant of all the manœuvres of the captain, some of which seemed sufficiently strange. At times, for instance, when not a cloud was to be seen in the sky, he would pretend to expect foul weather, and run for shelter under some lonely cliff, where he seemed more intent upon looking out for something on the water than in the air; and though he affected vast displeasure at the unceasing drunkenness of his crew, one could almost have sworn that he put flasks of brandy purposely in their way.

One evening, in a profound calm, and while all the sailors, drunk as fishes, were capering round a tall pole crowned with myrtle, a boatful of Maynote* pirates, concealed behind the rocks of Antiparos, stole unperceived under our stern, and climbed up by the poop into the cabin. The master, who just before had gone below on some errand, and had been seized in the midst of his business with a most unaccountable fit of sleeping, was soon laid hold of and gagged. All the stand of arms, neatly arranged round the room, were next secured; and the pirates, now rushing up stairs, easily mastered the few among the sailors who were still able to stand upon their legs, while they had nothing to do but to bind hands and feet the remainder, lying about the deck in a state of perfect insensibility.

Amid the general intoxication, I had been kept sober by my grief, and happened to stand near the cabin-door, just when, at the window opposite appeared the ugly features of the foremost of the Maynotes, who was preparing to slip in. My figure caught his vigilant eye as he advanced his head; when, drawing it back, he put his finger on his mouth, and frowned most formidable threats should I disobey the sign. To this I felt not in the least inclined. I might, indeed, by giving the alarm immediately, have saved the crew from the captain's treachery; but all had used me ill alike. I therefore answered the command by a gesture of ready compliance, and let things take their course.

In the beginning of the fray, the pirates affected to treat the captain very outrageously; but this appearance of enmity soon subsided, and by degrees they sat down amicably together, like old friends who understand each other's ways. Having so handsomely performed my neutral part in the business, I now was thinking to approach and put in my claim, if not for poundage, at least for hush-money, when a new incident most provokingly blew up the well-concerted scheme.

* Maynote—native of the peninsula of Mayno, whose inhabitants are almost all pirates.

It happened, that just at this juncture the famous Hassan capitan-pasha* was in the act of delivering the Morea from its Arnaoot† oppressors. One of his caravellas,‡ stationed before Nauplia, by chance espied our doings, and immediately gave us chase. She soon obliged us to bring to; but instead of liberating the vessel, treated her as a lawful prize. It is true, that while the Turks tied the pirates back to back, they only handcuffed the real owners. The captain shared the fate of his crew. Thus was poetical justice dealt out to all except myself; and thus was I, hapless Greek, compelled, in the space of four days, to bear the yoke of four different nations—French, Venetians, Maynotes, and Turks. Whether I gained by the last change, or only fell from Charybdis upon Scylla, I can only relate after I have premised a short account of the celebrated expedition which I was so unexpectedly made to witness.

CHAPTER II.

IN the first war between the Russians and the Turks, the most natural proceeding for Russia would have been, to attack Turkey from its southern extremity, where the two countries joined. The most surprising was, to send an armament from its northern shores, where the Russian and the Turkish empires were separated by the whole intervening diameter of Europe; and whence its entire circumference of coast was to be sailed round before Russians and Turks could meet. This, therefore, was the measure preferred; and the Russian fleet had wintered in its progress at Leghorn, ere its commanders were determined in which part of Turkey to strike the first blow. The Greeks decided the question for them. A few turbulent Codgea-bashees§ of the Morea, fearing the lash of the Turkish governor of the province, sent to the Russian commanders a forged plan of insurrection, * Capitan-pasha—commander-in-chief of the Turkish navy.

† Arnaoot—Turkish name given to the Albanians who profess the Mohammedan religion, and form the body-guard of many of the Turkish pashas.

as one already organized ; and on the return of the deputation, employed the promise of Russian assistance thus fraudulently obtained, to produce the commotion they had described as ready to break out. Their labour was assisted by the Turks themselves. Suspecting a plot against them, these pusillanimous oppressors acted like men who, from the fear of falling from a precipice, plunge headlong down it. In their panic, they massacred a whole troop of Zaccuniote peasants peaceably returning from a fair at Patras, whom they mistook for an army of rebels marching to attack them. The cry of revenge now resounded from all quarters ; and when, therefore, in the spring of 1770, the Russian fleet cast anchor in the bay of Vitulo, its commanders were received by the bishops of Lacedæmon* and of Christianopolis, followed by Greeks of all descriptions, only begging as a favour to enlist under the Russian banners. Fair as seemed this beginning, the understanding between the two nations was short-lived. The Greeks expected the Russians alone to accomplish the whole task of their deliverance. The Russians had laid their account with a powerful co-operation on the part of the Greeks. Each, alike disappointed, threw on the other the blame of every failure. Their squabbles gave large troops of Arnoots time to pour from every neighbouring point of Roumili into the peninsula ; and the Russian commanders, seeing all chance of success vanish in that quarter, sailed higher up the Archipelago, leaving the Moreotes to their fate, and carrying away no other fruits of the momentary contact of Greeks and Russians, but an increase of rancour between the two nations.

The ferocious mountaineers of Albania, who, under the name of Arnoots, form a chief part of the forces of the Ottoman empire, and of the bodyguard of its various pashas, presented in their rugged and yet colourless countenances the greatest possible contrast to the regular features and rich complexions of the Greeks. In the faith of the two nations the difference is less marked. Wavering for the most part between Christ and Mohammed, the worship of the Arnoots is generally determined by the master they serve ; and many of those who, on the spur of pay and plunder, came to assist the Moreote * Lacedæmon and Christianopolis—two Greek bishopricks in the Morea, thus denominated.

Moslemen against the Christians, themselves professed the Christian faith. Their total number was computed at about twenty thousand; and when their work was achieved, they demanded their wages. The money was wanting, or at least the pay was withheld. This furnished them with a plausible pretence for disbanding on the spot, and paying themselves, by pillaging the country. Some, after laying waste the villages, drove the inhabitants before them, like herds of cattle, through the derrens or defiles that guard the entrance of the peninsula, and thus regained, with their new slaves, their native mountains. Others remained stationary in the Morea: by instilling themselves in the houses and lands of the Greek peasantry, they deprived the soil of its husbandmen, and the Turks of their subjects; and at last, finding no more rayahs* to oppress, turned their violence against the Moslemen themselves, and treated like the vanquished those whom they had come to defend.

Nine following years had seen eleven governors come, one after the other, with the most peremptory instructions to exterminate the banditti, and again depart without succeeding; some for want of sufficient force to repress their outrages; others, it is said, for want of sufficient resolution to resist their bribes.—At last the Porte sent Hassan.

By birth a Persian, by the fate of war a Turkish slave, by choice among the recruits yearly raised at Smyrna for the Barbary powers, and by his own merit advanced to the rank of port-admiral of Algiers, Hassan-bey became at variance with the dey. Justice was so entirely on his side, that prudence urged his immediate flight. After many wanderings, he found a patron at Constantinople in the famous Raghîb, grand vizier† under two successive sultans, and yet permitted to die in his bed. In the memorable battle which the Russians, after abandoning the Morea, gave the Turks in the straits of Chio, he commanded the admiral-ship of the Turks, which was attacked by that of the Russians, while the two commanders, Khassim and Orlov, both kept aloof from the fight. Prevented by his instructions from unmooring, * Rayahs—subjects of the Porte, not Mohammedan, who pay the capitation tax; such as Greeks, Armenians, Jews, and gipsies.

† Grand Vizier—All pashas before whom are carried the three horse-tails have the title of vizier; but the head of that distinguished body, the lieutenant of the grand signor, who represents him in his councils, and commands his armies, is called by the Turks vezir azem, by the Franks grand vizier.

Hassan towed his ship on its anchors, boarded the Russian vessel, and only threw himself into the sea, and swam ashore, when both hulks, on fire, and blown up together, mingled their wrecks in the sky. The sultan, seeing his navy annihilated, and himself threatened with bombardment in his seraglio by a fleet from the Baltic, now named Hassan his capitan-pasha, and was saved.

At the peace, this commander exerted himself to form a new navy, and to introduce among the Turks as much of European tactics as their prejudices could bear. He had no immediate opportunity to try the effect of his improvements against a foreign enemy; but in an empire so extensive as that founded by Othman, when age has enfeebled its head, some distant extremity will always refuse obedience: and Hassan constantly found disturbances to quell in some quarter. In 1776, he made the Arab Daher—usurper of the sovereignty of Acre—atone with his life for the league he had formed with the Egyptian rebel Aly. The year following he punished Daher's sons for continuing their father's rebellion; and finally, in 1779, he received the sultan's orders to expel from the Morea the refractory Arnaoots. Already was his army encamped in the plains of Argos, when one of the caravellas of his fleet stationed in the Bay of Nauplia conveyed our mixed party of Venetians and Maynotes to that port, where, with my companions, I was—unceremoniously enough—stowed away for the night under a strong guard in a crazy barn, wondering what was to be our fate the next morning.

The place of our confinement had long been the undisturbed domain of swarms of mosquitoes, who, ignorant of our unwillingness to trespass on their premises, seemed determined to resist the encroachment to the utmost. The constant buzzing and stings of these troublesome insects would alone have sufficed to deprive us of all chance of repose; add to which that, paired as we were according to the fancy of our guardians, and each closely connected with his immediate companion by every strongest tie—of twisted hemp, the blows which each intended for his winged enemies in general only fell upon his pinioned associate. Excuses indeed followed, but were of little use in composing us to sleep. My other, but not my better half in this forced union, suffered as much as myself, but seemed endowed with more philosophic resignation. On my throwing out a few hints respecting the inconvenience of our bedchamber, the patient personage assured me I was fastidious. He had often seen worse apartments, and without the comfort of so much good company. This excited my curiosity; and, observing that it was impossible to think of sleeping, I entreated him to favour me with the description of some of those habitations, compared with which our present abode was such a fairy place.

"And so you want," he cried, "to know my adventures? Well! and why not? You are young, and seem of a promising disposition. My example and my precepts cannot fail to benefit your inexperience, and I will therefore this once do violence to my natural modesty, in order to gratify your wish for instruction. What, in fact, is the use of great achievements, but to tell them? Only let me entreat that your feeling heart may not be too deeply touched by the distressing tale of my ill-rewarded virtues.

"My early years," continued my companion, "offer nothing remarkable. They were spent in the inglorious occupation of cultivating my paternal soil. I thought it rather hard upon me that, whether I sowed my field or let it lie fallow, and whether it was that I reaped its produce or the locusts, the waywode* should equally exact the same enormous yearly tithe, should look upon the destruction of my crops by hail and tempests as the mere effects of my own malice, and should seize upon my instruments of husbandry, in order to make me more industrious. I thought it harder still, that on hearing how the conflagration of my hovel had consumed all my haratch tickets† for ten years back, he should demand the whole sum, already paid, over again; and I thought it hard beyond all bearing when, after a temporary absence, in order to save my dearly taxed poll, I should, on coming back with some money, laboriously scraped together for the purpose of redeeming my person and property, find all my little patrimony confiscated to the profit of my tyrant, as a punishment for abandoning what I returned to. In my rage, I flung myself on the ground; with my teeth gnawed the earth, that I might at least carry away some morsel of my paternal inheritance; and swore to make every Mohammedan I could lay hands on, however innocent, pay for the murderous waywode.

* Waywode—Turkish farmer of the revenue of a district.

† Haratch tickets—vouchers for the payment of the haratch or poll-tax, due by all rayahs.

"This oath brought me good fortune. I succeeded in sacrificing several victims to my just resentment; and as I chose by preference such as, being in good circumstances, had most to lose, I always made a point of retaining what I found about them, lest other Mussulmen should profit by my performance.

"Steadfast attention to this particular gave my task a double interest. The only person I admitted to share with me was the magistrate of the district; except, of course, where he himself happened to be the person stopped. Justice was much the gainer by this proceeding. Instead of the usual practice of hanging a single individual, the cadée* generally fined the whole community for not being able to produce the offender.

"I had a distant cousin at Zante,—the flower of the family, and so much admired by all ranks for his bravery, that people used to contend for his assistance in settling their affairs of honour. The nobleness of his sentiments equalled his courage. He only killed, as it were, to oblige his friends; and so nice were his feelings, where his character was concerned, that on being paid one day beforehand by a certain nobleman, to chastise another sprig of nobility, and on mature deliberation thinking the reward too ample for the service, he despatched his man outright, and so quieted his scruples, to the great delight and surprise of his employer. But these too disinterested sentiments at last obliging him to quit Zante, where merit excites envy, he came and joined me at Patras. From that period we only went in search of adventures together, like Theseus and Pirithous, Orestes and Pylades, and all the other worthies of old, whom my cousin had at his fingers' end; and astonishing was the number of monsters of which we rid the world, not only above ground but under: for one night, in a cellar, we killed half a dozen Arnaooots, lying dead drunk on the spoils of our country; and that without anybody the next day being the wiser, or thinking but that the scoundrels had done the deed themselves in a frolic. Never did we take a fellow's booty whom we did not also rid of his life. To do otherwise would have been tempting Providence, and was against my oath. My conscience being thus kept clear of premeditated sin, and my mind regularly unburthened by confession of unintentional offences, I continued to prosper, until justice, entirely disregarding gratitude, chose maliciously to turn against me. In disgust, I joined some Dulcignotes, who by the help of Algerine colours avoided some awkwardness in taking Christian vessels. I myself had now begun to consider religious prejudices as unworthy of a liberal mind, and to view all men as equal before God. What right had I to indulge in partialities founded on my own fallible judgment? On this principle I no longer made a difference between Turks and Christians, and most conscientiously treated both alike. Still, such is the force of habit, that I own I always felt a particular zest in stripping a heretic. To this moment, my mouth waters at the thoughts of the broad-bottomed Hollander, full of the richest spice and gewgaws, which I once helped to unload. She was going right before the wind, and with a brisk gale, just at the rate of two knots an hour, and had not a single picture of a saint, nay, not so much as a crucifix on board, or a taper to burn to the Virgin; though so tenacious were her punchy crew of their pipes, that, when chucked overboard, they kept puffing on as long as their tobacco or themselves lasted. Their cargo set me up for a while, until fresh misfortunes led back the way to my old trade. The greatest piece of ill luck I reckon to have been my partnership with our present captain. Had I foreseen the bungler he would prove, I should have carried my wits to a better market. But no matter!—the most laudable intentions are sometimes defeated; and a little rub disconcerts not Panayoti.”

Highly edified with the incidents of this worthy man's history, and still more with his candid and unassuming manner of relating them, I almost regretted that the dawn should so soon, through the chinks of the wall, break in upon his artless and unvarnished tale, to announce a speedy change of scene. In fact, very soon after the doors of our saloon were thrown open, and our party called out to be formed into marching order. The separate pairs, connected together by a thick rope into a single body of small width but of prodigious length, offered the beauties of distinctness combined with those of blending; and all, set in motion by the simple mechanism of a kick bestowed in the rear of the foremost pair, immediately advanced, guided by a few spahis before, while others followed behind. Argos was the place of our destination, and in less than four hours our column reached Hassan's camp, scattered over the whole plain. Not only all the troops of the province flocked round the commander's standard, but several Greeks even had obtained permission to join the Turks against those very Arnoots whom, some years before, the Turks had called in to save them from the Greeks.

I had never seen an encampment, and the novel and striking sight absorbed all my faculties in astonishment and awe. I thought I beheld forces sufficient to subdue the whole world; and I knew not which most to admire, the endless clusters of tents, the enormous piles of armour, and the rows of threatening cannon, or the troops of well-mounted horsemen, who, like dazzling meteors, darted by us in every direction, leaving clouds of dust behind them. The very dirt with which they bespattered us seemed to me imposing; and every thing upon which I cast my eyes gave me a feeling of nothingness, which made me shrink within myself like a snail in its cell. I envied not only those who were destined to share in all the glory and success of the expedition, but even the meanest follower of the camp, as a being of a superior order to myself; and when suddenly there arose a loud flourish of trumpets, which, ending in a concert of cymbals and other warlike instruments, re-echoed in long peals from all the surrounding mountains, the clang shook every nerve in my body, thrilled me to the very soul, and infused in all my veins a species of martial ardour so resistless that it made me struggle with my fetters, and try to tear them asunder. Proud as I was by nature, I would have knelt to whoever had offered to liberate my limbs, and to put into my hands a sword.

The tumult of my senses had not yet subsided, when, leaving the camp on our right, we were ushered into the court of a small habitation, in the town of Argos, to undergo an interrogatory from Hassan's droguman. We waited a good while before the gentleman came. At last he arrived.

How widely things often differ in reality, that bear the same names! In the droguman of the capitan-pasha I had figured to myself a personage nearly of the same stamp with the consular interpreter at Chio, who had the honour of being my father. I might as well have compared a wren to an eagle. The individual of the tergiu-manic genus before whom I now stood came with the state of a little prince, and seemed surrounded by a miniature court of his own. When he spoke, his attendants only answered in a whisper; at his slightest commands they flew as if the fate of the empire were at stake; and when he smiled at a joke of his own, they all shook with laughter. As his movements were abrupt, and rather eccentric, it was amusing to see them scamper after him, trying to keep close to his heels, and not to be thrown out of their ranks by his vagaries.

From what cause it so happened I know not, but the moment this great man addressed our captain, who stood first and foremost of our troop, his eye fell on me, though one of the very last in the column; and from that time forward he never more changed the object of his attention. For the space of half a second or so, indeed, he might glance at the intervening individuals whom he successively interrogated; but, uniformly, after addressing two or three words to them, his eyes again began to wander, to seek something farther off, and when they had found me, they fixed themselves with their former steadfastness upon my humble person. My business was to have looked respectfully away from so exalted a personage, or to have modestly dropped my eyes on the ground, as if I durst not encounter his sublime aspect. But this I attempted at in vain. As if under a fascination, I scarce could keep myself from gazing on him with the same steadiness with which he perseveringly eyed me.

At last came my turn to speak. Questioned respecting my birth, parentage, country, cause of absence from home, &c., I told my little tale with tolerable ease as well as veracity, and my candour particularly shone in my strictures on the captain, who had not perhaps yet so impartial and so observant a biographer. My recital amused, and when finished, "You little Greek rascal," exclaimed the drogusman, "you will corrupt these worthy Roman Catholics, if I leave you among them; so I'll keep you here, and let them go home, to swing on St. Mark's after their own fashion." With this compliment my companions were dismissed. They slunk away, muttering some curses, which under the drogusman's mighty wing I could afford to disregard.

Mavroyeni belonged to the most distinguished family in the island of Paros. He had from a child felt a spirit too expansive tamely to brook the restraint of his confined birthplace. The restlessness of his temper was increased by the predictions of a priest of Santirene; one who foretold so much, that it was impossible but something, now and then, must fall out as he predicted. Fixing his eyes on the little Taooshan,* "Young man," cried he, as if inspired, "brilliant will be thy career; but may thy end be happy!" The first part of this twofold oracle gave an additional stimulus to the youth's ambition, the latter a new motive to his parents for checking its sallies: but, like other predictions, the one in question at last worked its own accomplishment. When Hassan capitan-pasha made the harbour of Drio in the island of Paros the summer station of his squadron in its yearly cruise through the Archipelago, young Mavroyeni threw himself so frequently in his way, so anxiously implored his accepting an entertainment from his father, and so successfully paid his court to the commander, as to obtain the promise of his protection at Constantinople. Upon this he immediately went forth, plunged headlong into all the intrigues of the Fanar,† and through his own dexterity and the patronage of the high-admiral, in less than three years supplanted Argiropoli, the old and long-respected drogueman of the navy; and gave his new situation an importance it never yet had known. Former drogouemen were nothing more than interpreters and spokesmen, even to the most imbecile and stupid of commanders. To the most energetic and quick-sighted of pashas whom the Turkish navy yet had obeyed, Mavroyeni became an adviser and a friend. The lion, at whose roar Moslemen trembled, showed with the subtle Greek the meekness of a lamb; and even when, informed of his interpreter's unlawful transactions, Hassan for a moment felt his anger rise, and swore he would cut off the head that resisted his commands, Mavroyeni's appearance was sufficient to turn his wrath into complacency, and to draw down new favours on that head just devoted to destruction. Every outrage of Mavroyeni's on the laws and on the habits of the Turks only seemed to increase his influence with his patron; and the Greeks, still as prone as of old to ascribe each strange effect to some supernatural cause, ceased wondering at the drogueman's sway, only to wonder at the drugs of which he composed his filter.

* Taooshan—hare; epithet given to the Greek islanders.

† Fanar—district of Constantinople, where chiefly reside the Greeks of the higher class.

CHAPTER III.

RECEIVED among the suite of this important tergiuman,* I was soon made to exchange my miserable tarred jacket for the ample benish† of finest broadcloth trailing on the floor, the first mark of my promotion; but I could not help regretting the loss of my raven locks, indifferently replaced, in my opinion, by a clumsy calpack‡ of short black lamb's wool. I swore I would some day, cost what it might, doff my uncouth headdress for one of those smart turbans of gilt brocade or shawl, worn with such a saucy air, over one ear, by the pasha's tshawooshes;§ gentlemen who were seen every where lounging about as if they had nothing to do but to sport their handsome legs, their vests stiff with gold lace, and their impudent bullying faces.

I had confidently expected that my first apprenticeship in my new service would have been to the use of the carbine and the sabre. Great, therefore, was my mortification when, instead of learning to shoot an enemy, or to cut down a rebel, I had to practise carrying a coffee-pot, or presenting a pipe; and once, when a young fellow-attendant displayed his wit in jokes on my awkwardness, I got into such a passion that I thrust my lighted pipe head foremost into his grinning mouth, and made his pert tongue smart for its petulance. An oldish, mild-looking man, a privileged domestic, who, having served out his time, now acted as a sort of pedagogue to the new comers, discerning my aspiring disposition, took me aside:

"Listen, young man," said he, "whether you like it or not. For my own part, I have always had too much indolence, and too little ambition, not to make it my study throughout life rather to secure ease than to labour for distinction. I have therefore avoided cherishing in my patron any outrageous fondness for me, which would have increased my dependence while it lasted, and exposed me to persecution whenever it subsided;—but you, I see, are of a different mettle: I therefore may point out to you the surest and speediest way of attaining the more perilous height, short of which I know you will not rest satisfied. When you have compassed it, you may remember me, if you please.

“ Know, first, that all masters, even the least loveable, like to be loved. All wish to be served from affection rather than duty. It flatters their pride, and it gratifies their selfishness. They expect from this personal motive a greater devotion to their interest, and a more unlimited obedience to their commands. A master looks upon mere fidelity in his servant as his due; a thing scarce worth his thanks: but attachment he considers as a compliment to his merit, and if at all generous, he will reward it with liberality. Mavroyeni is more open than anybody to this species of flattery. Spare it not, therefore. If he speak to you kindly, let your face brighten up. If he talk to you of his own affairs, though it should only be to dispel the tedium of being all day long the vehicle of other men’s thoughts, listen with the greatest eagerness. A single yawn, and you are undone! Yet let not, however, curiosity appear your motive, but the delight only of being honoured with his confidence. The more you appear grateful for the least kindness, the oftener you will receive important favours. He will feel a pleasure in raising your astonishment. His vanity knows no bounds. Give it scope, therefore. When he comes home ready to burst with its suppressed ebullitions, be their ready and patient receptacle. Or if at first he should feel some hesitation to indulge in familiar talk with one so inferior, discreetly help him on, provide him with a cue, hint what you heard certain people, not knowing you to be so near, say of his capacity, his merit, and his influence. He wishes it to be believed that he completely rules the pasha. Do not flatly tell him he does; but assume it as a notorious fact, a thing which no one disputes. Be neither too candid in your remarks, nor too fulsome in your flattery. If too zealous a worship of truth would savour of disrespect to your master, too palpable deviations from fact might appear a satire on his understanding. Should some disappointment evidently ruffle his temper, appear not to conceive the possibility of his vanity having received a mortification. Preserve the exact medium between too cold a respect, and too presumptuous a forwardness. However much Mavroyeni may caress you in private, never seem quite at ease with him in public. A master still likes to remain master, or at least to appear so to others. Should you get into some scrape, wait not to confess your imprudence, until concealment becomes impossible; nor try to excuse the offence. Rather than that you should by so doing appear to make light of your guilt, exaggerate your self-upbraidings, and throw yourself entirely upon your master's mercy. On all occasions take care how you appear cleverer than your lord, even in the splitting of a pen. Or if you cannot avoid excelling him in some trifle, give his own tuition all the credit of your proficiency. Many things he will dislike, only because they come not from himself. Vindicate not your innocence when unjustly rebuked. It would be a reflection upon your master, and exasperate him the more. Submit for the moment; and trust that, though he never will expressly acknowledge his error, he will in due time pay you for your forbearance."

To this friendly but rather long admonition, I made the customary return for good advice. I listened, while pinned down, with an air of impatience, and ran away, as soon as I was able. But though I thanked not the author, I took care to profit by the remarks.

Mavroyeni's situation subjected him to a species of persecution which almost balanced the pleasure of beholding the proudest agas of the country daily cringe at his levee as lowly as at that of the pasha himself. It was the annoyance of being visited by all his own relations and kindred, from every island of the Archipelago, far or near, large or small. He had not, in the remotest corner of the Levant, a cousin in the fiftieth degree, known or unknown, whom the fame of his favour drew not out of his den to come to Argos, for the purpose of sharing, equipped after one fashion or another, in the good things which they imagined the drogueman had nothing to do but to give for the asking; and relationships before dormant, or wholly obliterated, were now brought to light and supported by oral and written proof, so as sometimes absolutely to confound my master.—Nor could these anxious kinsfolks and friends be made to comprehend why the particular time when Mavroyeni went forth into public, or was surrounded by his whole court, should not be the very best for bustling up to their cousin, and roaring out their claims, or reminding him of their former intimacies. All day long they beset the drogueman's door when he was at home, or lay in ambush for him when he went out; and so great became at last the persecution, that at every new disembarking of passengers at Nauplia, he used to be seized with a fit of the ague.

There is a danger in doing things too well. What was at first volunteered as an extraordinary feat is soon assigned as an everyday task. I once happened to dismiss one of these troublesome visitors from my master's door too dexterously; and from that time it became my regular office. The appointment, it is true, could not have been in better hands. Without troubling the drogueman for particular instructions, or annoying him with awkward messages, painful to the delicacy of a man who would rather have been thought only allied to Jove, whenever a new face presented itself at the door, I knew at once by its cut and dimensions whether it could conveniently be suffered to pass the threshold, or not; and when I found it either too long or too wide, or too red or too shining, or otherwise inadmissible or questionable, I resolutely defended the pass committed to my care, was as formidably repulsive as Cerberus himself, and minded not even a little scuffle in the cause: sure of never being taxed by my master for disrespect to his blood. Hence it happened that once or twice, on the drogueman's expressing a fear that certain of these visitors might call, I had the pleasure to inform him that they had called, and would call no more; after which, whenever a stranger was announced, the answer, "Let Anastasius go to him," was quite sufficient to explain the reception he was to meet with, and the way in which his importunities were to be treated.

By thus anticipating my master's sentiments, I rose to such a degree of favour, that often, after having in public caused Turks of the highest rank to stare at his haughtiness, he would in private put his humble cafedgee* in no fear but from his excess of familiarity; for frequently it left me almost unable to bear in mind the old preceptor's caution, and to refrain from overstepping my station. One evening, after other conversation, "Anastasius," said the drogueman, "I told the pasha to-day what a graceless stripling I had picked up. He will see you to-morrow."

A person so terrible as this pasha, and who so filled the world with the mere sound of his name, must, I thought, equal Homer's heroes in size. I estimated his stature at the least at eight feet; and accordingly, when ushered into his presence, kept looking up at the ceiling, until I nearly fell over a little man squatted on the floor, whom I only, by the commotion my heedlessness excited, recognised as the formidable Hassan. I know not whether the pasha felt nettled at the abruptness of my approach, or had been discomposed before; but when, ready to sink into the ground with dismay at my blunder, I stepped back to repair it and kiss the hem of his garment; he no more heeded me than the dust of his feet, which I brought to my forehead. Mavroyeni soon perceived that the moment was inauspicious, and made me a sign to withdraw. I immediately slunk away.

There is a something in my nature that revolts at every act of humiliation performed towards a fellow-creature. Nothing but the extreme kindness of Mavroyeni could reconcile me to my servile situation; and his indulgence had made me expect equal caresses from Hassan himself; "I only stoop," thought I, when appearing before him, "to rise the higher." But when I found myself left in the dust in which I had been cringing, without gaining any thing by my submission but a contemptuous look, how deeply in my heart sunk the mortification! Scarcely could I contain myself while hurrying out of the room. On the very threshold I burst into a flood of tears.

Fresh constraint, however, soon again became necessary. My fellow-attendants, to whom I had been boasting of my summons, were all waiting in a row, to know the result of my visit. Lest its luckless and ill termination should make them too happy, I had to convert my sobs into smiles, at the inexpressible graciousness of my reception.

The principal tribe of the rebellious Arnauts, the Beckiarcées, established to the amount of about ten thousand in the very capital of the Morea, kept its governor, Mehemet Pasha, as some supposed, a willing prisoner. Hassan, ere he engaged in actual hostilities, once more offered them, on condition of immediately quitting the country, an unqualified pardon; but the hardened banditti, whether confiding in their numbers or in other less apparent means of averting the blow, rejected all compromise, intrenched themselves under the walls of the city, and bade defiance to the pasha's forces.

Probably they expected to awe him by this show of resolution. They were deceived. On the tenth of June, about noon, Hassan set out with four thousand picked men for Tripolizza, and continued on the march the whole night. Mavroyeni followed the pasha, and I followed Mavroyeni. In my capacity of Greek, and still more of cafedjee, I had not the least hope of personally contending with the foe, and all my solace was the chance of a sly thrust at some runaway. But my master, desirous to let me have my share of all the good things that offered, after whispering something in the pasha's ear, suddenly turned round to me: "Anastasius," he cried, "I have obtained his highness's permission for you to shoulder a musket, and to join in the fight like an Osmanlee."*

The favour, no doubt, was inestimable, but its suddenness somewhat confounded me. I however felt that I must seem delighted, and though with something of a flutter about my heart, endeavoured to look all joy in the face. In order to confirm my assurance of unutterable satisfaction, I kept singing all the way; though now and then, perhaps, a little out of tune. But let it be recollected what I was—a Greek, in whose hands until that moment a musket had been deemed, among Moslemen, a positive sacrilege, and who had only learned by stealth to take aim at a sparrow.

I shall, therefore, not attempt to deny, that when the early dawn showed in front of our column, between ourselves and Tripolizza, at the distance of only a few hundred yards, the whole Albanese encampment, my stout heart began to beat; and that when the next moment I heard Hassan give orders for the charge, breath seemed for a moment to forsake me. Shame, however, supplied the place of bravery. The danger I could not avoid, I determined not to think of; and following the example of the more experienced warriors around me, I swallowed in a hurried manner several copious draughts of a certain nameless liquor, which on particular occasions the high admiral wisely allowed himself to distribute among his followers; whereupon, whether it be that the inspiring potation did its duty, or that courage is infectious like cowardice, my heart, the very moment before almost sunk to my heels, rebounded with such energy, that in my outrageous bursts of bravery, I could scarce refrain from breaking from the ranks, and engaging some hero of the adverse party in single combat, even before the line was formed; and when the trumpet sounded the charge, when the onset began, and the whole body of cavalry at once rushed forward, causing the earth to shake under the horses' hoofs, such grew my delirium, that I scarce saw, heard, or felt, much less had senses to think.

Mavroyeni had taken care to confide his cafedgee, excellently mounted, to a trusty spahee,* whose side he enjoined me not to quit. But at that moment, not heaven itself could have prevented my giving the reins to my warlike spirit. The cloud of smoke which arose soon baffling the vigilance of my guardian, I gave him the slip, and spurring my steed with all my might, at once plunged into the thickest of the fray. There, finding the loading of my pistols too tedious a process, I began hacking and hewing with my yatagan;† consoling myself for any mistake I might make in the objects of my ire, with the thought that my blows never could fall amiss, where all alike were enemies to Christianity and oppressors of the Greeks. If, upon this principle, I hit one or two of our own men, too much engaged to heed whence came the compliment, I made amends by cutting down as grim an Arnaoot as ever wore red whiskers, in the very act of measuring one of our spahees for a back-handed blow; and by this feat, so happily timed, and more happily observed, gained prodigious credit. It elated me to such a degree, that thinking myself quite invulnerable, I was next going to rush headlong amid the only little knot of Lalleotes who still were maintaining their ground, when my guardian, again catching a glimpse of my person, stopped my mad career, grasped me by the arm, and, spite of my despair at not seeing the end of an affair in which I had taken such an active part, began dragging me away. The rout of the Arnaoots, however, at that moment becoming complete, he listened to the entreaties of those who had witnessed my behaviour, and again let me go. I darted forward like an arrow from the bow, and gave chase to the now dispersing foe.

Foremost in the attack, I soon was foremost in the pursuit. Among the Albanians flying before us like chaff before the wind, two particularly caught my eye; who, somewhat apart from the rest, and brushing by a small patch of furzes, thought them a convenient cover in which to slink away. Steadfastly, however, I kept watching their progress, and, enabled to trace their route by the motion of the bushes, I left the rest of the troop to follow this promising scent. Fortunately, my fugitives, in their panic, instead of turning short upon me, when separated from my friends they might have cut me to pieces, only pushed forward, until the hindmost, getting entangled among the briars, I lodged the contents of my carbine in his side, and made him bite the dust; while the other only ran the faster for his comrade's groans.

My great ambition had been to take a prisoner, to possess a slave. I therefore left the disabled man as secure, to his own meditations, and with my biggest voice called to the other to surrender. Luckily, he did not even look round at the stripling who addressed him; but presently leaping down a little eminence, disappeared in a thicket, where I thought it prudent to give up the hazardous chase.

I now returned to the fellow whom I had left writhing on the ground, apparently at the last gasp. Thinking, as I approached, that I still perceived something in him like a latent spark of life, which might only wait to spend itself in a last home-thrust, I swiftly sprung forward, and, for fear of foul play, plunged my dagger to the hilt in his heart ere I ventured to take any other liberties with his person. This done, I deliberately proceeded to the work of spoliation. With a hand all trembling with joy, I first took the silver-mounted pistols, and glittering poniard, and costly yatagan; next collected the massy knobs of the jacket, and clasps of the buskins, and still more valuable sequins lying perdue in the folds of the sash; and lastly, feeling my appetite for plunder increase in proportion as it was gratified, thought it such a pity to leave any part of so showy an attire a prey to corruption, that I addressed the dead man completely.

When, however, the business which engaged all my attention was entirely achieved, and when that human body, of which, in the eagerness for its spoil, I had thus far noticed the separate limbs only one by one as I stripped them, all at once in its full dimensions struck my sight, as it lay naked before me; when I contemplated that fine athletic frame, but a moment before full of life and motion unto its utmost extremities, now rendered an insensible corpse, and that by the random shot of a stripling whom in close combat its little finger might have crushed, I could not help feeling mixed with my exultation a sort of shame, as if I blushed for having taken a cowardly advantage of a superior being; and in order to make a kind of atonement to the shade of an Epirote—of a kinsman—I exclaimed, with outstretched hands, “Cursed be the paltry dust which turns the warrior’s arm into a mere engine, and striking from afar an invisible blow, carries death, no one knows whence, to no one knows whom; levels the strong with the weak, the brave with the dastardly, and, enabling the feeblest hand to wield its fatal lightning, makes the conqueror slay without anger, and the conquered die without glory!”

On the very point of departing after this sort of expiatory ejaculation, with my heavy trophy, the thought struck me that I might incur a suspicion of sporting plumes not my own, unless I brought my vouchers. In that view, I began detaching from his scull the Armaoot’s ears as pledges for the remainder of the head, when at leisure to fetch it; but considering how many gleaners stalked the harvest-field, and that if I lost my own head I should get no other, I determined to take at once all I meant to keep. The work was a tough one, and the operation awkwardly performed, but I succeeded at last; and now, in an ecstasy of delight, though almost afraid to look at my bundle, I returned to our party, for ever cured, by an almost instantaneous transition to temerity, of every sentiment of fear. Indeed, such remained for some time the ferment of my spirits, that while I carried my load on one arm, I kept brandishing my sword with the other, still eager to lay about me, and to cut down whomsoever I met.

My master, already informed of my prowess, and on the lookout for my return, on seeing me arrive thus fierce and turbulent, immediately cried out, “Bravo, Anastasius; at your first outset you are become a complete hero! But,” added he, laughing, “since the fight is over, and the enemy routed, suppose you put up your sword and wash your face.”

The advice was seasonable. I had in the heat of the engagement received, I know not how, a cut across the jaw, of which the scar remains to this day, and shows a shining white ridge across my strong black beard.

The head,* which in imitation of my companions I laid before the pasha, he only treated as a football—a usage which made me feel vexed for its dignity and my own; but when the whole harvest was got in, he ordered the produce to be built into the base of a handsome pyramid. The remaining Arnoots of the peninsula, cut off at the Dervens, afterward supplied its top, and thus afforded the inhabitants of Tripolizza a most agreeable vista, which they enjoy to this day. One of our men, indeed, attempted to keep back from the common store a scull of his own collecting, meaning to turn it into a drinking-cup for private use; but the pasha severely censured an idea “so disgraceful,” he observed, “to a civilized nation like the Turks,” and was near making its author, in punishment of his offence, contribute to the building materials from his own stock. As for myself, when I came to offer my mite, I found that same Hassan, before so supercilious, all condescension. Bravery was with him the first of virtues, some said the only one. Putting his hand into his pocket, he pulled out and gave me a handful of sequins, adding, “You are a brave lad; and if you will but become a true believer, you may rely upon me for promotion.”

At this flattering offer my heart rose to my lips. At once I would have answered, “Moslem, or heathen, or whatever your highness pleases!” but a look from my master stopped my complying speech. I read in it a positive prohibition, and durst not disobey. Prostrating myself on the ground, I begged the pasha would command his servant any thing but to renounce his precious faith. This behaviour had the good luck not to displease the vizier, and much to gratify the interpreter. It entirely gained me the heart of a nephew of Mavroyeni, his uncle’s agent, named Stephan; a man who was said to keep his accounts between this world and the next much more even than his older relation. Indeed, so little had the drogueman the reputation of being tenacious on the score of religion, that I could not refrain from asking him, “why he should thus have stood in the way of his servant’s fortune?”

* The head, &c.—It is customary among the Turks, after a battle, to give a reward for every head of an enemy that is brought to the commander.

"You fool," was his answer, "I only stood in the way of your ruin. Had you accepted the high admiral's proposal, you would immediately have received some inferior appointment, and in that you would have been left to waste the remainder of your life. Your first promotion would have been your last. Despised by the Turks, and shunned by the Greeks, you would have found support nowhere, and must henceforth have lived not only degraded, but, what is worse, forgotten. Has it never struck you," added he in a whisper, as if afraid of being overheard, "that if much were to be gained by a Christian turning Moslemin, there are others besides yourself sufficiently reasonable not to stick at the difference between Kyrie-eleison, and Allah, Illah, Allah!"*

This observation set all reply at defiance. I laid by my sword, and resumed my coffee-tray.

The interior of the Morea being liberated from the Albanians, Hassan determined to spend the remainder of the season in clearing its seas of the Maynotes. A strong detachment was sent with instructions to force the passes of mount Taygetus, the abode of those miscreants; and our encampment was in the mean time removed from the plain of Argos to that of Nauplia. Precisely the small slip of this otherwise delightful valley which is closest to the city, and extends under the tremendous rock of the Palamida, had by the seawater constantly oozing in been rendered a swamp, vying for noxious exhalations with the opposite morass of Lerna. Hassan, while waiting the issue of the expedition to Mayno, resolved, without knowing much of the garden of the Hesperides, to make this pestilential nook its fac-simile; and by way of restoring to their pristine innocence and purity the somewhat deteriorated minds of his Arnoot prisoners, had them conveyed on shore every morning, chained two and two, to forward this rural design. Hands that never yet had wielded any thing but weapons of war and destruction, were now reluctantly seen to grasp instruments of peace and husbandry, and to exchange the sword and the carbine for the rake and the spade; and men only accustomed to cut and clip human limbs gnashed their teeth with rage at being compelled to prune orange-trees and to tie up carnations.

Like other distinguished personages, Hassan had his enemies in the capital. They represented his attempt on the impregnable fastnesses of Mayno as a mad scheme; they ceased not to inveigh against his extortions: but the crime they dwelt upon with peculiar eloquence and pathos was, his atrocity in employing Mohamèdan captives to lay out his shrubberies; and one morning that Hassan, in the midst of his works, was inhaling in copious streams the incense of his courtiers vying in compliments on his taste, came a fulminating hattisheriff from the Porte, to enjoin the immediate liberation of all his prisoners, and the return of his squadron to Constantinople.

* The difference between Kyrie-eleison and Allah, Illah, Allah.—Greek and Mohammedan forms of prayer, or invocation to the Supreme Being.

Vain would be the attempt to paint the pasha's rage. Striking his forehead with the imperial mandate, he swore he would obey its commands—would deliver his prisoners from their bondage—but only in death! and ordered them to be marshalled for immediate execution. The signal was given, and at each waving of his hand fell a head. Every beholder looked aghast, but none durst breathe even a syllable of intercession for the victims. Fifteen heads already lay gasping amid the parterres their wearers had planted, and seemed only a prelude to the fall of as many hundreds; when Mavroyeni at last stepped forward, and throwing himself at his master's feet, begged he would have mercy, not on the culprits, who deserved their fate, but on his own innocent lilies and jasmines, which had done nothing to deserve being deluged in blood, instead of moistened only by the dews from heaven.

Perhaps the pasha himself had already begun to reflect, not on the cruelty of his conduct, but on its consequences. Perhaps he was not sorry for an excuse to desist from his rash vow. His jocularity between each new act of the disgusting spectacle might only in reality be intended to slacken the progress of the slaughter. The flowers were pitied, the massacre stopped, the garden abandoned, and the not-yet-pollarded Arnaoots conveyed to the passes out of the Morea, there to be turned loose upon the remainder of the Turkish empire.

By the sacrifice of a few of the purses which he had collected, Hassan still obtained leave only to resign the command of the Morea to Hadgee Ibrahim, his own kehaya:* a man who, in turns, pilgrim at Mecca, chief of banditti in Roumili,* slave merchant on the Black Sea, and soldier at the Dardanelles, was by no means the pasha's unapt representative; but who nevertheless was only allowed to succeed him with the subordinate rank of moohassil,†—the exhausted state of the peninsula disabling it from supporting, in a governor, the burthen-some weight of the three tails.

The news of the entire failure of the Maynote expedition became the signal for our departure. In my impatience to behold the capital, I had been counting the days and hours till we should sail, and had been frightened by many a report of our wintering at Nauplia. Inexpressible, therefore, was my joy, when, on the fifteenth of November, 1779, I actually saw the anchors heaving, and the sails unfurled.

Behold me now at sea a second time, not like the first, on board a paltry trading vessel, only surrounded by tarred sailors, and myself toiling like a galley-slave, but in a superb three-decker, a positive moving city on the waves; basking in the sunshine of a vizier of the first class; viewing, whichever way I turned my eyes, glittering officers and guards; and having nothing myself to do but to wonder at all I saw. This I did abundantly. Not a hole or corner of the vessel was left unexplored; and, though exceedingly wroth on board the Venetian at being obliged to bear a part in working the ship, which I then thought an intolerable drudgery, I here, on the contrary, from being very much discouraged by the sailors in my attempts to assist them, found no pleasure so great; and was constantly lending a hand in setting the sails, bracing the yards, and imitating, like a monkey, all I saw others do. Frequently, when my master sent for me to my birth below, I was up in the main-top; and I seldom came down from this favourite station, except to listen, open mouthed, on the carriage of a gun, to the glowing descriptions of the wonders and delights of the capital—the city by pre-eminence—which some one or other of my companions was constantly praising. It seemed to me, though the wind continued unabatingly fair, that we never were to reach this earthly paradise.

* Roumili—The Greeks of the lower empire affected to call themselves Romans, their language the Romaic, and their country Romania, which the Turks have changed into Roumili.

† Moohassil—a governor of a province, inferior in rank and power to a pasha.

On one occasion, indeed, the current of my thoughts, thus far uninterruptedly directed towards Stamboul,* experienced a sudden stop, a total reflux. The intellectual tide, till then only flowing in one direction, at once ebbed, and set the contrary way. It was when we came in sight of my native land, of my beloved Chio. While rapidly sailing before the wind along its verdant shores, a pang shot to my heart—an indescribable yearning seized upon my soul. At the back of that ridge of purple crags, which I could almost touch with my hand, lived my aged parents; lived, sighed—perhaps sighed no longer—my injured Helena, the first loved of my heart! Were not the rocky screen between, I might actually at that instant behold their now melancholy homes, and in less than an hour I might restore the mourning tenants to their wonted serenity. I might receive and bestow the embraces of love and of duty; I might again possess the united blessings of those whom I had so cruelly abandoned; I might tell them, “Anastasius has fought, Anastasius has vanquished, Anastasius returns to you. He returns to deposite at your adored feet, and to sacrifice to your love and your pardon, the laurels he has gathered, and the praise and promises he has gained.” “Now is,” thought I—“but soon irretrievably to vanish—the moment in which to recover kindred, country, peace of mind, and connubial happiness. If again cast away, they must be lost for ever!”

Frantic at this thought, I hastily left the deck, and hurried to the drogoman, to entreat that I might be put ashore, and allowed to return among my friends.

On what trifling circumstances depends the fate of our lives! Had I felt less anxious I should have succeeded. I should have reached my master's presence, have preferred my petition, have obtained my suit, have been reinstated in my filial privileges, and probably at this time have been the happy father of a numerous progeny of my own, with the soothing prospect of a tranquil and respected old age.

A nail head made the difference!—A nail head causes me, by remote consequences, at the distance of many years, to die in a strange land, a premature and painful death. Not sufficiently clenched in the boards, this unfortunate iron (on which may lie all my sins!) protruded most unwarrantably from the steps of the cabin. Several times already it had caught my flowing dress; and each time condemned to decapitation, it had only been relieved from thoughtlessness. In the eagerness of the moment, I hooked it with my shaksheer,* as I ran down stairs, and, losing my balance, fell, and came with my scull against the floor of the cabin.

Senseless from the shock, I only recovered to find myself lying on the deck, with my head in the lap of one of the Pasha's telawooshes. The first thing upon which my eyes opened was his vest—one of those gorgeous specimens of embroidery which I had so greedily coveted, and had so fully determined some day to obtain: the first thing I heard was a condescending message of inquiry from the pasha himself! So much glare dazzled my senses; so great an honour overpowered my weak brain. For some time, indeed, I scarce could remember what had occupied my thoughts prior to my accident. All in my mind was confusion and darkness; and when I again began with some clearness to retrace my ideas, the contact was too immediate with one species of object near my heart, not to feel the attraction of other more distant treasures, weak in comparison. It now seemed to me a womanly act to cast away all the fruit of the perils I had passed, of the reputation I had gained, and of the favour I had earned:—to exchange the fame and greatness that awaited me, for obscurity and oblivion; to prefer to the destinies of the eagle, soaring from region to region, those of the worm, content to die in the same clod in which he was born, and perhaps crushed to death before his time by the more bold and aspiring. I knew I should be laughed at by all on board only for hinting such a whim; and, on further reflection, I felt not at all sure that my very filial duty itself did not make it incumbent upon me to seek at Constantinople that rank, which might be so powerful a protection to my parents on their little island.

Still, however, some inward doubt remained. As soon as I was able to move, I rose and ran to the side of the ship, to see what way she had been making since my accident, and whether there still was time to execute my design. Chio had already dwindled away into a scarce visible speck. The magnet ceased to act; my lately excited feelings subsided, and my no longer distracted mind gradually resumed its former hopes, its vanities, and its ambition. Its current again, as before, only flowed whither our prow was tending. Stamboul again became, as before, its polar star; and if some natural regrets still arose at intervals, the new and bustling scene which ensued, during the few days we lay at anchor before Mytilene and Tenedos, completely dispelled them. These days appeared to me so many ages, only from their delaying our arrival in the capital.

At last we entered the Boghaz!* stunned by the incessant thundering of an almost uninterrupted succession of batteries, lining the shore right and left all the way, I felt not the less as if sharing all the honours of their salutes, and could scarce repress my joy and exultation. In a few hours, I was to behold that celebrated city, whose origin lay hid in the obscurity of ages, whose ancient greatness had often been the theme of my infant wonder, and whose humiliation under the Othoman yoke I had, in concert with my didaskalos† of Chio, frequently lamented with tears; but which—even in its present degraded state, and groaning under the despotism of the Turks—had, from a child, been the final object of all my views and wishes.

A most favourable wind continued to swell our sails. Our mighty keel shot rapidly through the waves of the Propontis, foaming before our prow. Every instant the vessel seemed to advance with accelerated speed; as if—become animated—it felt the near approach to its place of rest; and at last Constantinople rose in all its grandeur before us.

With eyes riveted on the opening splendours, I watched, as they rose out of the bosom of the surrounding waters, the pointed minarets, the swelling cupolas, and the innumerable habitations, which, either stretching away along the winding shore, reflected their image in the wave, or creeping up the steep sides of the mountain, traced their outline on the sky. At first agglomerated in a single confused mass, the less parts of this immense whole seemed, as we advanced, by degrees to unfold, to disengage themselves from each other, and to grow into various groups, divided by wide chasms and deep indentures—until at last the clusters, thus far distantly connected, became transformed, as if by magic, into three entirely different cities,* each individually of prodigious extent, and each separated from the others by a wide arm of that sea whose silver tide encompassed their stupendous base, and made it rest half on Europe and half on Asia. Entranced by the magnificent spectacle, I felt as if all the faculties of my soul were insufficient fully to embrace its glories: I hardly retained power to breathe; and almost apprehended that in doing so, I might dispel the gorgeous vision, and find its whole vast fabric only a delusive dream!

CHAPTER IV.

It was with difficulty I could collect my scattered senses, when the time came to step down into the nutshell, all azure and gold, which waited to convey the diogueman's suite to the Fanar, where, with the other principal Greeks, Mavroyeni had his residence. Each stroke of the oar, after we had pushed off from the ship, made our light caïck† glide by some new palace, more splendid than those which preceded it; and every fresh edifice I beheld, grander in its appearance than the former, was immediately set down in my mind as my master's habitation. I began to feel uneasy when I perceived that we had passed the handsomest district, and were advancing towards a less showy quarter; I suffered increasing pangs as we were made to step ashore on a mean-looking quay, and to turn into a narrow dirty lane; and I attained the acme of my dismay, when arrived opposite a house of a dark and dingy hue, apparently crumbling to pieces with age and neglect,‡ I was told that there lived the Lord Mavroyeni. At first I tried to persuade myself that my companions were joking; but, too soon assured they only spoke the truth, I entered with a fainting heart. A new surprise awaited me within. That despised fir-wood case of dusky brown, the regular uniform of all the Fanariote palaces, and which seemed so much out of repair that the very blinds were dropping off their hinges, contained rooms furnished with all the splendour of eastern magnificence. Persian carpets covered the floors, Genoa velvets clothed the walls, and gilt trellice-work overcast the lofty ceilings. Clouds of rich perfumes rose on all sides from silver censers. And soon I found that this dismal exterior was a homage paid by the cunning of the Greek gentry to the fanaticism of the Turkish mob, impatient of whatever may, in Christians, savour of ostentation or parade. The persons of the Fanariote grandees were of a piece with their habitations. Within doors sinking under the weight of rich furs, costly shawls, jewels, and trinkets, they went out into the streets wrapped in coarse, and dingy, and often threadbare clothing.

*Three entirely different cities—namely, Constantinople, Galata, and Scutari.

† Caïck—light wherry of a most elegant shape plying about the quays of Constantinople.

‡ A house of dark and dingy hue, crumbling to pieces with age and neglect—the former circumstance being in consequence of the sumptuary laws imposed by the Turks upon the Greeks; the latter in consequence of the Greeks often affecting poverty in order to avoid being heavily taxed by their tyrants.

My arrival in the capital was almost immediately followed by a removal from my private situation to a more public office. Whether the drogouman of the capitan-pasha thought it unbecoming for a sprig of his own body—a drogouman's son—to appear in the capacity of a domestic, or whether he conceived a taooshan like himself, unconnected with his rivals in office and entirely dependent on his nod, was, in point of trustworthiness, the next thing to a mamluke;* or whether, finally, he considered my acquirements and my capabilities as above being circumscribed by the exigencies of a coffee-tray, he had scarce had time to look about him, ere he conferred upon me the employment—I would say the dignity—of relieving him of some of the lesser details of his business, which consisted in every day attending at the arsenal, there to introduce to the high admiral the persons, and to interpret the petitions of Greeks and of foreigners; for in the style of the Turkish diplomacy, a Christian ambassador demanding an audience was introduced as a suppliant preferring a suit.

While, to perform the duties of his office, Mavroyeni

* Mamluke—name given among Mohammedans to such white slaves as are destined to be gradually promoted to offices of importance within doors and without.

himself held his usual station in the capitan-pasha's own apartment, I was installed in a small adjoining room, where I had to hear, to understand if I could; or, whether I understood or not, to set down and condense into the shortest possible written abstract, the long stories of petitioners, and the endless dialogues of disputants; a thing which, the less I could make out of the business the better I always succeeded in. It was here I learned that art of generalizing so esteemed, as I am told, among Frank* philosophers.

Undoubtedly, had I had my choice, I should have preferred the truncheon to the pen. But the drogueman had not the former in his gift; and the tedium of the latter was materially relieved by certain circumstances attached to its exercise. For it soon became notorious, that nothing assisted me so much in giving weight to a case as a few sequins, slipped from sheer absence of mind between the leaves of the huge quire of paper always before me; and in this respect the difference between my master and myself only consisted in his receiving purses† where I received single pieces.

Still, to one who loved money only as the means of pleasure, my confinement could not but be irksome; and the moment that Mavroyeni disappeared, I too used to break up my levees, and to saunter about. Whenever my master was employed by the pasha in some long-winded expedition, I proceeded, either to spend the money already earned in some of the costly articles displayed for sale in the various teharees and bezesteens,‡ or to procure new customers for my own shop, by boasting in the coffee-houses and taverns of my influence with the drogueman. Was Mavroyeni, on the contrary, only expected to make a short absence, I contented myself with taking a turn round the precincts of the arsenal.

In one of these rambles I remember being shown two highly esteemed productions of the pictorial art, presented by the drogueman to the pasha. They were representations of two of Hassan's most memorable achievements; the surprisal of the Russians at Lemnos, and the bombardment of Daher at Acre. In these chef-d'œuvres all was depicted with the utmost accuracy—the vessels, the batteries, the guns, the very balls whizzing through the air, and the shells falling on the buildings. One feature alone was omitted in compliment to Turkish prejudices; a mere trifle—the combatants themselves! The picture certainly was not painted to the life; but this very circumstance—I averred to the Turkish officer my eicerone—so far from lessening its value, was in my opinion, the most judicious thing I had ever beheld. The great point in works of art, my language master at Chio had told me, was only to bring forward the leading objects, the essential supporters of the action; and to discard all insignificant and superfluous accessories. Now, what was it that, in engagements by land or by water, did all the execution? The men?—By no means! They only stood aloof. It was the shells, the bullets, the grape-shot. So much did the acuteness of this remark delight the officer, that in his rapture he clapped his broad whiskers to my face, and swore I was the only sensible Greek he ever had met with. It was evident that he knew not a countryman of mine, whom I found one morning in excessive wrath with a Perote artist—a Frank—for having painted him a Madonna with such force of light and shade, as absolutely to stand out from the canvass. He swore it was a scandalous production; almost as bad as an image! And the poor artist could not even obtain praise for his talent, much less payment for his labour.

I had been several weeks at Constantinople without yet seeing my patron's lady. Not that, like Turkish wives, she was kept secluded in his harem;* but, on the contrary, because, in order to enjoy greater freedom, she preferred spending her autumn at his villa on the Bosphorus. One afternoon Mavroyeni took me to Therapia† in his caïck, and I was there presented to the domina. She happened to be sunning her plump charms on the quay. Nothing could exceed the stateliness of her appearance; and had she not been as broad as she was long, she would have looked uncommonly dignified.

* Harem—the Turkish name for the apartment of the women: seraglio, or serai, meaning palace in general.

† Therapia—one of the villages on the Bosphorus, in which the Greeks of quality make their country residences.

Half a dozen female attendants who surrounded her had nothing to do but to support her august person; too important to support itself. One walked on before with a peacock-tail fan, to keep the flies from her shining face; and another behind, to shake the dust off her still more lustrous gown.

An untoward accident was fated to happen, just as every thing seemed disposed to strike a new comer with all possible awe and admiration. At the farthest outlet of the channel, in the very middle of its silvery expanse, on the verge of the horizon, was descried a dark speck that looked endowed with motion. Rapidly the opaque body advanced, skimming the surface of the waters like a swallow; and, as it approached, it increased in size and in consequence. Its wide extending fins dipped into the waves like the pinions of the swallow, while its sharp and prominent beak cut its way through the billows like the shark or swordfish. All eyes were riveted upon the threatening monster, and presently no one but myself any longer remained in ignorance of its nature or purport. It stood confessed—O horror!—not exactly a dragon come to devour our princess on the seashore like another Andromeda, in order to give me an opportunity of signalizing my gallantry as her Perseus; but something as bad, something worse, something full as savage, and much more inglorious: the bostandgee-bashee,* in his police boat, coming to nibble at the trains of the Greek princesses, which exceeded the standard of the Turkish sumptuary laws. At this terrific sight the arms of the six suivantes all dropped with one accord by their sides, and with them dropped to the ground their mistress's train. The snow-white ermine swept the filth of the road; while its wearer—who just before had appeared scarce able to stir a step without assistance—suddenly recovered the entire use of her legs, and waddled away by herself as nimbly as a duck pursued by a kite, until she got behind a wall, where she stopped to take breath.

As soon as the terrified party had safely reached the house, the fault of the precipitate retreat was laid on the impending shower. I had the imprudence, fool that I was, to run and look for a cloud. The only one I could find was that gathering on the lady's own brow; and my officiousness got me a look in that quarter, which boded more storms than hovered in March over the Bosphorus.

What could the company do, in the uncertain state of the sky, but collect round the tandoor?—that safe refuge against the winter's rigours, that eastern nondescript, which, in the angle of the mitred sofa, holds a middle character between the table and the bed; and underneath whose embroidered coverlet all the legs of the snug party converge round a pot of lighted charcoal, there to stew for the evening; while from its fringed outskirts, drawn over the shoulders, pop out and diverge on every side their respective heads and headdresses. Like the rest, I crept under the bed-clothes.

This was my first time of being admitted to a gossiping party of quality; and I must in justice to its members confess, that it yielded not to those of inferior rank. In the course of an hour or two I heard a very reasonable quantity of scandal. There was no recent occurrence in church or state, army or navy, boards or bedchambers, the bab-hinnayoon† or the back-stairs, but was properly collected, combined, compared, dissected, amended, and circulated. I now for the first time learned, to my infinite satisfaction, both the precise offence of the last vizier beheaded, and the precise length of the last feridjee‡ curtailed. I was informed in the same breath how the great Morosi managed his principality, and how the little Manolacki conducted his courtship; how the patriarch had quarrelled with the archons,§ and how the spatar|| had beaten his wife; how the mortgages of the church were redeeming, and how the slipper¶ money of the sultan was engaged: and I so confidently heard it asserted by a gentleman on my right, that the conference between a certain ambassador and the reis effendee** would produce a new war; and by a lady on my left, that the meeting between a certain archimandrite and his ghostly daughter would produce a new christening, that I no longer doubted that the fumes of the brazier over which we sat must have all the oracular virtues which issued from the cave of Delphi. On going to bed I expected from them very surprising effects, but to my disappointment I experienced none other than a dream, in which I beheld the sultan pounding the grand mufti in a mortar,* and the pope of Rome standing by, crying bravo!—"Bravo!" echoed I, with all my might,—when my own voice waking me, I got up to return with my master to the capital.

"Weil, Anastasius," said the drogueman to me as we were cleaving the waves of the Bosphorus, "how do you like our Constantinople life?"

"Very much," was the answer evidently expected, but which I did not give;—feeling little edified with my visit to Therapia, where I had had my share of the second-hand insolence which the Fanariotes take very quietly from the Turks, only to put it off among the Taooshans. "Not at all," was the short reply I made.

The drogueman stared. I felt I had been too laconic.—"Were the rest of the Greeks I see here," added I, "at all like your highness, the place would indeed be a paradise; but this capital seems to change the nature of whatever it harbours; and my countrymen, so gay, so light-hearted at Chio, seem at the Fanar at once dull and important. Besides, the difference made between Christians and Mohammedans here is too great, too mortifying. The few Moslemen of Chio mingle with its rayahs on a footing of equality. They almost reckon it a favour to be admitted to their junketings. But here, the very noblest of the Greeks—your highness alone excepted—is daily exposed to the insults of the meanest Turk. Were it not for my principles, I would rather be a Turkish porter than a Greek prince."

Mavroyeni looked thoughtful. After a little pause, "You mistake, Anastasius," replied he, "in thinking the Greek of Constantinople different from the Greek of Chio. Our nation is every where the same. The same at * Pounding the grand mufti in a mortar—according to the ancient mode of capital punishment inflicted on the heads of the law, whose blood it was deemed irreverend to shed.

Petersburg as at Cairo; the same now that it was twenty centuries ago."

I stared in my turn.

"What I say," continued my master, "is perfectly true. The complexion of the modern Greek may receive a different cast from different surrounding objects: the core still is the same as in the days of Pericles. Credulity, versatility, and thirst of distinctions from the earliest periods formed, still form, and ever will continue to form the basis of the Greek character; and the dissimilarity in the external appearance of the nation arises, not from any radical change in its temper and disposition, but only from the incidental variation in the means through which the same propensities are to be gratified. The ancient Greeks worshipped a hundred gods, the modern Greeks adore as many saints. The ancient Greeks believed in oracles and prodigies, in incantations and spells; the modern Greeks have faith in relics and miracles, in amulets and divinations. The ancient Greeks brought rich offerings and gifts to the shrines of their deities, for the purpose of obtaining success in war, and pre-eminence in peace; the modern Greeks hang up dirty rags round the sanctuaries of their saints, to shake off an ague, or to propitiate a mistress. The former were stanch patriots at home, and subtle courtiers in Persia; the latter defy the Turks in Mayno, and fawn upon them at the Fanar. Besides, was not every commonwealth of ancient Greece as much a prey to cabals and factions as every community of modern Greece? Does not every modern Greek preserve the same desire for supremacy, the same readiness to undermine by every means, fair or foul, his competitors, which was displayed by his ancestors? Do not the Turks of the present day resemble the Romans of past ages in their respect for the ingenuity, and, at the same time, in their contempt for the character of their Greek subjects? And does the Greek of the Fanar show the least inferiority to the Greek of the Piræus in quickness of perception, in fluency of tongue, and in fondness for quibbles, for disputation, and for sophistry?—Believe me, the very difference between the Greeks of time past and of the present day arises only from their thorough resemblance, from that equal pliability of temper and of faculties in both, which has ever made them receive with equal readiness the impression of every mould, and the impulse of every agent. When patriotism, public spirit, and pre-eminence in arts, science, literature, and warfare were the road to distinction, the Greeks shone the first of patriots, of heroes, of painters, of poets, and of philosophers. Now that craft and subtlety, adulation and intrigue, are the only paths to greatness, these same Greeks are—what you see them!”

To me it mattered little whether the modern Greeks resembled the ancient or not, as long as I was not reckoned on a footing with my neighbours the Fanariotes. I therefore paid Mavroyeni a compliment on his oratory, and let the subject drop; still muttering to myself, “Stamboul is a detestable place!”

It remained not always so. The Fanariotes—whose defect is not want of quicksightedness—soon perceived that I was a great favourite with the favourite of the favourite par excellence: and as no ramifications of this genus, however distant, were to be neglected, I began to enjoy my due share of adulation and of consequence. Those who before were deaf when I spoke to them, now addressed me the first; and the identical joke which formerly left the muscles of every face unmoved, now had the power to set a whole table in a roar. With my situation my manners underwent a total change. The rude exterior of the islander had been exchanged among the caleondjees* of the capitan-pasha for a swaggering braggadocio air. The martial strut was now laid aside for the smooth simpering smile of the courtier. Instead of spluttering out my unpolished sentences by half-dozens in a breath, as if I had more words crammed in my throat than my mouth could give utterance to, I now practised with a nonchalant air to drop only now and then a significant monosyllable, so profound in its meaning that nobody could get at it;—and as to the mother tongue, the Romaic† idiom, it was no longer to be used, except interlarded with such scraps of French, Italian, and Turkish as to render it almost unintelligible to the vulgar auditor. Athwart my borrowed languor and effeminacy, however, the native vigour and raciness of the soil would break forth now and then with such energetic bursts, as both astonished and delighted the Fanariote fair. To them my roughcast homage offered an acceptable contrast to the mawkish tenderness of their everyday admirers. My freedom passed for naïveté, my neglect of forms evinced a flattering devotedness, and my rustic exterior promised affections more robust and lasting than could be expected from the sickly natives of a large capital. Flattered by the men and smiled upon by the women, I now said to myself—"Stambool is a charming place!"

So great, indeed, became in it my vogue, that, had my fastidiousness been less, I might have boasted my mistresses, as our great men have their pelisses, suited to every season of the year: for while autumn still continued to pour forth from her golden lap every richest fruit and dainty, a grocer's fair spouse—herself the image of ripeness and of plenty—offered to feed my good-will with figs and raisins, to pay for the sweets of my converse in honey and comfits, and to support the ardour of my affections with rosoglio and with spice: when winter began to chill the blood, the sleek helpmate of a furrier would fain have dispelled my freezing coldness, by means of cat and rabbit skins, nay, have raised the wished-for warmth in my heart, at the expense of all her husband's rarest ermines and sables; and when returning spring enamelled every field with fresh flowers, I beheld at my feet a whole bevy of beauties, just budding, like the violet and the daisy, and, to own the truth, as little exalted:—but comfits were only lures for boys; ermine had no charms, except as the garb of royalty; and even beauty itself could scarcely obtain even my passing attentions, when destitute of rank and fashion.

The first lady possessed of these latter attributes, whom I found disposed to cast an eye of compassion on my sufferings, was of the devout order, and the very domina who had excited the oracular ingenuity of one of the party on my first visit to Therapia. The worthy archimandrite to whom were intrusted her spiritual concerns had, on the application of her husband, been exiled by the patriarch to the holy mountain,* in order to pursue his meditation with less interruption. The lady, now finding that even the long beard of a priest was not able to screen her reputation, resolved to try whether the beardless face of a boy would ensure it from further scratches.

* The holy mountain—Mount Athos; that beautiful promontory, now occupied by twenty-two Greek convents.

A first success, obtained in a distinguished quarter from real preference, leads to others granted by vanity. But with my fashion increased my fastidiousness. All could not catch that laid snares for me; nor could all keep that caught me. My favour was precarious, and—a little tyrant in love—I treated the tender passion quite in the Turkish style.

Still I continued undistinguished, nay, unheeded by the proud Theophania. Not even by accident could this lofty lady's looks descend to my level. She appeared unconscious that a being so insignificant as myself existed, filled its portion of space, and breathed the same air with her noble lungs. If she wished to move from one part of the room to another, and I happened to stand in the way, her hand would mechanically push me aside, without the participation of her mind, like a chair or a table, while her averted eye was directed to some more distant point of space. In vain I might lay myself out for her approbation—I could not even obtain her satire. The very ridicule of Theophania would have been too much notice for one so low as I. It was positive condescension in her, one day when, in an humbler quarter, I showed myself insatiate of adulation, to turn round to me, and with some impatience to say, "great people, sir, are praised: little ones should be at the trouble of praising themselves!"—So violent indeed was her temper, and so sarcastic her conversation with individuals of every rank and degree, that even the most distinguished among the Fanariotes only approached her with fear and trembling, and, as soon as the indispensable rites of politeness had been performed, hastened away, ere, like the drones in a hive, they felt the sting of this intractable queen-bee. The shafts of Cupid she had usually turned aside by her petulance; but the few times they happened to draw blood, she had loved as others hate.

Undismayed by these difficulties, I swore she should be at the feet of the Taooshan whom she vouchsafed not to suffer at her own; and thenceforward bent the whole force of my genius towards attracting her attention, and exciting her interest. When therefore she, who at first had feared to disgrace her pretty pouting lips with the mere sound of my name, began to abuse my person and my character with most loquacious virulence, I considered my triumph as secure. "Theophania," cried I—though not yet loud enough to be heard by herself—"you only pursue me with contemptuous looks, to feast your eye on my person ; and you only load me with opprobrious epithets, to fix your mind on my image !”

If at last—which love and discretion forbid my ever boasting!—the prize rewarded my pains, yet troublesome was its tenure. The Euxine passes not more quickly from tranquillity to storms, than from serenity to passion changed my tempestuous and variable mistress. One moment, infatuated to perfect forgetfulness of her pride and station, she would clasp my knees in ecstacy, and, humbling herself to my very feet, glory in her debasement ; the next, choking with rage, she would suddenly start up again, rail at her degradation, wonder what she saw in me to admire, and charge me, on my life, to disclose by what spell I had compelled her affections ; but again, after having heaped upon me every direst execration which her fertile fancy could suggest, her passion would take another turn, and, bursting into a flood of tears, she would conjure me by all that was most sacred, if I could not return her love, at least to pity her agony—and assist in breaking the charm I had wrought, by rendering myself purposely as hateful as possible.

What more could I do than I did ? The only thing she ever saw me coax were my own little budding mustachioes, whose education and growth I watched over with the tenderness of an anxious parent : the only things she ever heard me praise were the qualities to which she had the least pretension—self-command, endurance, meekness. The preferences I felt in other quarters I freely owned ; and the consolations I found when she banished me her presence, I regularly enumerated. In my vulgar exultation (for vulgar it was), I treated with the familiarity of a clown one who had been used to the deference of a queen ; and to all such as had formerly suffered from Theophania’s insolence, I boasted of being their avenger. Yet, in spite of my conduct, her love lessened not ; it only became more notorious ; it afforded a sneering public a richer treat ; and at mass every eye in the church seemed constantly vibrating between the grated gallery above, where Theophania sat with the other women, and the part of the nave below where, by her express desire, I took my station, in order that she might see me during her devout prayers.

Let man make his confidential friend of no woman, except such a one as he cannot possibly make his mistress; viz. his mother, his sister, or his aunt. If she happen not to stand with him in any of these forbidden relationships, be she ever so old, or ugly, or infirm, she will end by feeling disappointed; and will accuse her unsuspecting friend of both too much and too little reserve.

A quiet, demure-looking woman—one of those persons with whom one feels as much at ease the first time of seeing them as with an old acquaintance—once or twice so good-naturedly cautioned me, when on the point of imprudently courting public censure, that I determined, professedly, to open to her my whole heart and circumstances. Why not? “She herself had renounced all love engagements. They gave more trouble than they were worth; and she infinitely preferred to the feverish enjoyments of passion the calm pleasures of friendship—that is, of stable male friendship, which one could depend upon. A tenderer intercourse she only contemplated in others at a distance, by way of amusement, and in order to study human nature in its different varieties and shades. As to female friendship, she held it in the contempt it deserved.” The looks of this good lady had informed me that she perfectly knew all my doings. Giving her my confidence, therefore, was only binding her to discretion; and, at first, I saw every reason to congratulate myself upon this determination. The tone of my new friend, with me, was that of a mother with her son; overflowing only with parental tenderness. Her whole anxiety was to keep an inexperienced youth out of difficulties. But I soon found that, from her appeals to my prudence, the company present was always excepted. Incensed at this discovery, I spoke in anger, and was answered with asperity. We parted, no more to meet in friendship;—but I continued not the less to live in the remembrance of this excellent person.

Theophania's husband held one of the highest offices at the court of Moldavia. He was wont to date his days of repose from those of my attentions to his wife. He could have raised a statue to my merits from sheer gratitude, were statues ever raised in modern times from such an antiquated motive. All he prayed for was the permission to keep his eyes shut. This was precisely what my little friend would not grant. Qualified for the task she undertook by my former confidence, she kindly forced upon him such irrefragable proofs of his wife's imprudence, as permitted him no longer to be blind to her conduct.

I was so accustomed always to be the last in my appointments with Theophania, that one day in the verdant valley of Kiad-hané,* the favourite haunt of the Cupids of Constantinople, I felt rather nettled at finding myself, though much after my time, the first at the place of rendezvous. Still I waited, and waited on; until impatience began to fan my languid flame; and Theophania's star began to mount. Alas! while I was trying to cool my ardour by contemplating from the Keoschk the fleeting stream in which the weeping-willow was gently dipping its delicate spray, as if striving to steal a last parting caress from the waves that fled its embrace, little did I imagine that the proud Theophania was jogging along in a rumbling kotshi—screaming until she was able to scream no longer—to the borders of the Black Sea; thence to be conveyed in an open boat—much too sick with the motion even to scold—to the port of Galatsch, where a stout mule waited to carry her, bumping in a basket, to the presence of her loving husband! he gave her a tender embrace; assured her she had a decided vocation for the monastic life; and, accordingly, whisked her off the next morning to the most secluded convent in the province of Valachia; where, I understand, she has continued ever since; fasting, praying, and scolding by turns. As soon as I had heard of her adventure, I went and thanked my little friend for the service she had unintentionally rendered me.

My own day of retribution from the hands of my master was approaching. Neither my affair with Theophania, nor even, I believe, my daily neglect of my official duties was the cause of my disgrace. It was the cloud, the fatal cloud, which I could not see, when the bostandgee-bashee passed by Therapia; but which nothing could dispel from madame's angered mind except my dismissal. Her husband would have preferred to have kept me; but among the tongues he commanded, that of his wife had never been numbered in the family. He neither could stop it, nor yet had acquired the facility of listening to its explosions, as to the softer murmur of a mill. He therefore might rule in great affairs abroad, but always ended by obeying in little matters at home: content to save his credit, by pretending to do from choice what he did from necessity.

One evening, after having repeated my frequently pardoned error of staying out the whole day, I was, on coming home, disappointed of the lecture I expected at my master's hands. Instead of blustering, as usual, Mavroyeni asked what had detained me, in the most placid tone imaginable. I now gave myself up for lost. It was precisely the tone which the drogueman was wont to assume, when, fully resolved to have no further dealings with the person who had offended him, he deemed reproach a useless waste of breath. I however made out a little story, which Mavroyeni listened to very patiently; and then pointing to the door, desired me to walk out, and never to walk in again.

I knew him too well to have the least hopes of his recalling a sentence uttered in this manner. My only remaining solicitude, therefore, was to make a dignified retreat. After a profound bow—of defiance rather than of respect—I strutted away, carrying my head so high that I knocked it against the sofite of the door.

But in spite of my seeming indifference I felt injured, if not degraded; for in surveying my conduct, I only took into account the last drop that rose above the brim; the rest was hid within the vessel.

I need not observe, that what to me appeared the height of injustice was deemed by the remainder of the family only a tardy and inadequate act of equity. Such as it was, however, it caused great jubilation; and in the twinkling of an eye, the whole Fanar was informed of the secretary's disgrace:—only it was ascribed to my having, with a pistol in one hand and a sword in the other, made such proposals to madame la droguemane, as she could not possibly listen to—from her husband's clerk.

Eaves-dropping never was among my fancies. Nor was I fond enough of puzzles to put together broken sentences, which in general may be made to bear any signification; but one's own name is a great stumblingblock in the way of one's discretion: and when, crossing a dark passage as I went out of the house, I heard mine pronounced with great vehemence, the sound acted like a talisman. It riveted me to the spot. I stopped to hear my panegyric. All I could collect, however, was only that, most abundantly hated, while in the fresh zeal of my service I chose to perform more than was set down for me, and to do better than others, I had since retrieved my character in the family, by mending my ways and neglecting my business. On that account I now carried away a certain portion of good-will. The party present regretted my fall; but the chief orator consoled himself by thinking me such a daring and dexterous fellow, that, happen what might, I was always sure to come down upon my legs.

"Amen!" cried I, walking out, "I accept the omen!"

CHAPTER V.

As the night was already far advanced, I went, until the next morning, to one of those temples of hospitality which are never shut against a stranger who sues for admission with a silver tongue. It was sheer churlishness in me, no doubt, to defer for so many hours affording my numerous friends the constantly wished-for opportunity of testifying the sincerity of their regard. As soon, however, as the sun had risen high enough to shine upon their munificence, I determined no longer to delay their happiness. I even resolved, in order that none should complain of being omitted, to begin my visits methodically at one end of the Fanar, and not to leave off till I had reached the other extremity. In the course of this experimental round, I found the warmth of my well-wishers precisely in an inverse ratio to their means. The higher classes made it a matter of conscience not to receive a servant discarded by his master. Those of a lower degree expressed their willingness to continue my friends as long as I had a piastre left: only reserving to themselves the privilege of dropping me, the moment their poor assistance became desirable. Nothing, however, stopped me in my circuit, until I had knocked at the farthest door in the district:—for I still bore in mind the last words I had heard under my master's roof, and wished to preserve an authentic record of my obligations to each of my friends. When no one remained to apply to, I cast up the sum total, and finding it a cipher, wished them all at the devil, and crossed over to Galata.*

I here got for my money a new set of cronies:—jolly

souls, who, not possessing a para* of their own in the world, never inquired what others were worth, but lived from hand to mouth, banished care, and set melancholy at defiance. They initiated me into a lower and more riotous species of intemperance than the decorum of my former situation had admitted. Every day we met in some of the taverns of the neighbourhood, where my new friends contributed their share of the entertainment in sallies at the expense of my old ones; and I in ready cash. It was quite consoling to hear how they pitied the drogueman for losing such a treasure as me; how they laughed at my wit even before I spoke, and how they drank every instant to my health and the success of my schemes. No day passed without a party of pleasure being proposed, for the sole purpose of keeping up my spirits. And, lest I should not be aware how entirely they all joined in it for my sake, no one ever ventured to inquire the cost. Indeed, so far from presuming to offend my delicacy by requesting to share in the expense, they thought it a proper compliment to my liberality to borrow from me whatever money they wanted. Not for the world would they give another the preference!

As soon as my finances were exhausted, my companions of course disappeared; not, however—to do them justice—from choice, but from sheer necessity, and because, having been entirely supported by me, they had now to shift for themselves. When my embarrassment became known, one person only came forward to relieve me, and that a female too—and one who had not much reason to be pleased with my proceedings—the little grocer's wife, whose figs and raisins I had disdained. Hearing an exaggerated account of my distress, and thinking me absolutely starving, she trundled away with all her pristine affection still at the heart, and a large pot of marmalade under each arm. These, and all else her shop contained, she pressed me to dispose of. Too proud to owe to charity what I could not earn by love, I pointed to my dress, which had cost a great deal, and still was worth a few sequins even to an old clothesman, and begged she would not urge me. "I will not receive," cried I, "where I can make no return; but when you thought I wanted bread, you brought me conserve of roses; and if any fresh ones ever strew my path, the deed shall be found recorded in the very kernel of my heart!"

Without leaving the poor little woman time to answer, I ran off to the only one of my dispersed associates whom I knew where to find. I wanted his advice; and felt sure he would not refuse what those who would give nothing else are often the most profuse in.

An ascent of about fifty steps brought me to his exalted abode. Its tenant might truly be said to look down upon the world. Just at midday Signor Vasili was awaking from his night's repose. On entering his aerial apartment, I still found him sprawling on his couch—stretching one arm, putting one leg to the ground, rubbing his eyes, and giving such a yawn, that I thought he would have swallowed at least half Constantinople, spread out before him. At my unlooked-for visit he stared, shook himself, as if to be certain he was not dreaming, and disposed his ears in silence to listen to my story.

"I came," I said, "to ask how people live who have not the usual and ostensible means of subsistence?" This Vasili had done so long, that it never struck him it could puzzle anybody. He, therefore, still continued some time staring at me in utter silence as before, in order to collect his thoughts. At last, jumping up in such a fury as almost to startle me, he seized hold of my arm, and led me to the window. The prospect from it extended over the immense city of Stamboul unto its utmost boundaries, and showed the inside like a prodigious ant's nest, where, far below the eye, myriads of little insects were bestirring themselves, crossing and jostling each other, and running backward and forward in every direction. I praised the view, said it was undoubtedly delightful to the eye, but still I could not see how it was to feed an empty stomach. "It may teach you to fill it with something else though," cried my friend Vasili; now for the first time breaking his long-protracted silence. "Of the thousands you behold in those streets, on those quays, in those boats, on the land, and on the water, one-half scarce knew this morning how to get a meal at noon, and a place of rest at night; yet I will engage, that every blockhead of them at this time has broken his fast, and will find a hole to sleep in! Why, therefore, should you fail, but from possessing too transcendent abilities? Only scare not away your invention by your fears; and, depend upon it, some means of livelihood will present itself! However, what leisure I can give to help it forward I shall willingly bestow."

So saying, Vasili thrust his hand into his pocket, and hauled forth a heap of the smallest coin of the realm. This treasure he poured on the sofa, and divided into three equal parts. Then, laying his finger on each in succession, "The first," said he, "we will drink together this morning, in order to whet our invention; the next I reserve for my own wants to-morrow; the third is yours, until you find it particularly convenient to repay me. Your brain thus will have an entire holyday, before you need call upon your wits for your livelihood; and when you thus are upon a par with myself, the deuse is in it if you cannot do as well!"

I thanked my generous friend: but just as we sallied forth to fulfil the first article of this partition treaty, he cast his eye upon my attire. It was no longer the flowing robe of the Fanar—the anteree* of state: I had exchanged that for the more dashing short dress of my last intimates. A rich embroidery covered the seams, and a costly velvet formed the groundwork. "I am thinking," said Vasili, "that your present wardrobe ill suits your purpose. Who can fancy a purse, stiff with gold outside, to be empty within? Supposing, therefore, on this occasion we give business precedence over pleasure, and, reversing the dreams of the alchymists, change gold into baser substances. We may afterward adjourn to a tavern to drink success to your metamorphosis. The showiest caterpillar, you know, must become a chrysalis ere it can soar a butterfly."

I could have dispensed with the chrysalis state: for though poor I still liked to look well; but I yielded to my friend's arguments, and hied with him to Sultan-bayezid,† to change the outward man. While we were looking for something suitable to our purpose, in stepped a worthy Israelite, who came, like ourselves, not to sell, but to buy. A still decent beneesh—but of a dusky hue—hid under a heap of gaudier dresses, seemed to catch his fancy; which the salesman no sooner perceived than all the powers of his oratory were summoned to extol the article in question. He had better have been modest about it. The Jew—both by nature and by cultivation an adept in the business—now put upon his mettle, at once began to pour such a torrent of profound observations on the art of old-clothes dealing, that the seller was glad at last to give him the cloak for nothing, ere he let all the by-standers into every deepest mystery of the trade.

In truth it was diamond cutting diamond. The Hebrew himself had long professed, in the elegant quarter of Hash-keui,* the noble trade of old-clothesman, until bankruptcy forced him to quit his district and his profession. Having early in life served an Esculapius of his own nation, with whom he learned a few terms of medicine, he now resolved to turn physician himself. The thing was easy enough at Constantinople, where a man need only stalk about in a furred cap† and a dark-coloured gown, followed by an attendant with a small square chest, to have all the men hold out their wrists, and all the women put out their tongues to him—in consultation.

The cap had already been provided. The beneesh was immediately put on, and the very attendant chosen in petto. For to the hawk's eye of my Israelite my anxious look at once bespoke me the very thing he wanted. Calling me aside, he made the proposal without much ceremony. I was ostensibly to be his servant, but in reality his partner. Even that clause, however, could not sweeten the nauseous draught. I felt so indignant at being proposed to for an apothecary's apprentice, that, without making any answer, I went and imparted the impertinent offer to my friend Vasili. But in that quarter I found little sympathy. "Sec," said he, laughing, "how fortune throws herself into your way. I wish you joy of your good luck." This speech I was willing to take as a joke, but I found it to be serious; and, more incensed than before, "Sooner," I cried, "if all other trades fail, would I, in one of those coarse and dingy lahse‡ jackets there, work for my bread in the fields! The earth cannot degrade its children, and no one requires a character to plough the ground." "True," replied Vasili; "but one may require a constitution, though; and who in their senses, pray, would take such a spindle-shanked fellow as you are just now, with a face as pale as a turnip already, and an eye, round which 'rake' is written in most legible black letters, to dig his garden for him? Ere you had half done, he would expect to have your own grave to dig! For my part, I would try what requires neither stock, nor capital, nor labour, nor even science as I take it, nor any thing but the impudence of which you possess a sufficient stock; were it only for the fun, and to see what no one but a physician ever sees. For, more potent even than gold, medicine will let you into the deepest recesses of the harem; and who can tell but, like our friend Lorenzo,* you may feel sultan's pulses."

This was setting the masquerade in its most tempting light. It tickled my fancy; and I struck the bargain with the Jew. He was to carry his own Galen, in the shape of the best half of an old missal, stolen from a Capuchin; I undertook the medicine-chest, with all its pills of starch, and all its powders of pipe-clay. The only thing I insisted upon as a sine qua non in the treaty was, not to appear in my new character in any of the streets I had before frequented; and to this ultimatum the Jew readily enough agreed. Matters thus settled between us, I somewhat dolefully exchanged my gaudy apparel for a dress in unison with that of my principal; and, after vainly begging, in gratitude for my friend Vasili's advice, to have the honour of making upon him my first experiment in this new profession, walked away with my grotesque patron.

Immediately we began stalking through all the lanes and by-streets of the capital; I, with a pace exactly regulated by that of my master, who walked before me, and both of us turning our heads constantly from right to left and from left to right, like weathercocks, to watch every call from a door or signal from a window; but full as much on the alert to avoid old faces as to court the notice of new ones. Now and then, when we had time for idle chat, I used to advise Yacoob—that was my principal's name—to provide himself with a proper license for killing the grand signor's subjects, in the shape of a diploma from the hekim-bashee.† He denied not the expediency of the measure, but he always found some pretence for delaying the performance. At first his poverty prevented the purchase; afterward the pressure of business; and so long did we go on, without any inconvenience from the neglect of the said formality, that at last we began to think we never should feel the want of it, and totally forgot there was such a person as a hekim-bashee.

Ours was an off-hand method of practice. As all cases were pretty much alike to our skill, a single feel of the pulse generally decided the most difficult treatments. Our patients—chiefly of the industrious class—could not afford long illnesses; and these we certainly prevented. What most annoyed us was the headstrong obstinacy of some individuals, who sometimes insisted they still felt disordered, when we positively assured them they were cured. Had they been killed instead, they would not have complained! Still more disagreeable incidents now and then occurred. Called in one day to a woman in convulsions, Yacooob, I know not why, prescribed a remedy which the Turks regard as an insult. In her rage, the woman flew at him, and bit off half his ear. It was all I could do to save the other half. Another day (a Mohanmedan festival) a set of merrymaking Osmanlees insisted on Yacooob's putting on a European dress, which they carried about on a pole, that they might kick him through the streets as a Frank; and though he actually refused a fee for gratifying their whim, he nevertheless was made to go through the whole ceremony.

I remember a quieter but more impressive scene. One evening, as we were returning from the Blacquernes,* an old woman threw herself in our way, and taking hold of my master's garment, dragged him almost by main force after her into a mean-looking habitation just by, where lay on a couch, apparently at the last gasp, a man of foreign features. "I have brought a physician," said the female to the patient, "who, perhaps, may relieve you." "Why will you,"—answered he faintly,—"still persist to feed idle hopes? I have lived an outcast: suffer me at least to die in peace; nor disturb my last moments by vain illusions? My soul pants to rejoin the supreme spirit; arrest not its joys: it would only be delaying my eternal bliss!" As he spoke these words—which even struck Yacoob sufficiently to make him suspend his professional grimace—the last beams of the setting sun darted across the casement of the window upon his pale yet swarthy features. Thus visited, he seemed for a moment to revive. “I have always,” said he, “considered my fate as connected with the great luminary that rules the creation. I have always paid it due worship, and firmly believed I could not breathe my last while its rays shone upon me. Therefore carry me out, that I may take my last farewell of the heavenly ruler of my earthly destinies!”

We all rushed forward to obey the mandate. But the stairs being too narrow, the woman only opened the window, and placed the dying man before it, so as to enjoy the full view of the glorious orb, just in the act of dropping beneath the horizon. He remained a few moments in silent adoration; and when its golden disk had entirely disappeared, we looked round at the Parsee. He too had sunk into everlasting rest!

Our easy successes among the lower orders by degrees made us aspire at higher patients. We took to attending the poor gratis, in order to appear qualified to try the constitutions of the rich; and by appearing to have respectable customers, we got them. A beglier-bey* of Roumili—the great-grandson of a sultan on the mother’s side (for on the father’s, such filiations are stifled in the birth)—was passing through Constantinople. One of his Armenian grooms chose to thank Yacoob for having been relieved by nature from a troublesome quinsy, and recommended him to his master’s kehaya. The kehaya also—in spite of Yacoob’s attendance—got the better of his rheumatism, and praised us to the head eunuch. The head eunuch, left by us as we found him, spoke of us in high terms to his master; and the vizier, on being seized with an indigestion for which he had laboured very hard, himself condescended to send for us to advise him. He, however, determined to have two strings to his bow, and to consult the stars as well as the faculty: so that my master found himself pitted against a moonedjim,† who recommended an emetic, while Yacoob insisted on a contrary remedy. The vizier determined to be right, slily took both, thinking thus to make the opposite opinions meet. The medicines certainly did; and by their conflict kept us for a while in as violent a perspiration as the pasha himself. As, however, the disorder only proceeded from too free an indulgence of a good appetite, the double remedy, though a little violent, in the end proved beneficial; and after suffering a few sympathetic pangs, we ultimately reaped both reputation and profit from our treatment of this three-tailed patient.

Thus we were enabled to quit our itinerant mode of life, and to set up near the Baktché-capoossee* a shop of decent appearance, furnished with jars and phials of all sorts and sizes. These we inscribed with the names of the most costly medicines, while the inside bore witness to their rarity. Instead of going in pursuit of patients, we now waited till they came or sent. In the course of his practice my principal had discovered that, if some ailments will only obey a face furrowed with age, youth and freshness best dispel certain others; and these he left to my sole management.

Our vizier (he was ours, body and soul) had his two regular wives—fixtures in the capital. But to his home establishment he added a lighter travelling equipage of half a dozen slaves, Circassians and others. Among this latter troop, the stag-eyed Fathmé shone like the full moon among the stars. Besides her patron of eighty or thereabouts, this fair one boasted two other equally strenuous admirers: the black eunuch who guarded the harem, and the old governess who kept its contents in order. These two personages used to devote half their time to the cares of their own persons, and the other half to watching that of their rival. Both having intrusted us with their health, each took an opportunity of hinting how agreeable I might make myself, by putting that of the other beyond the reach of contingencies. It was a glorious hint! Without going the whole length of the modest request, I might contrive to keep Signor Suleiman and Signora Zelidah confined to their beds, while I made my inquiries after the health of their prisoners; but unlooked-for incidents marred this bright scheme.

Disappointed at Yacoob's not being able to restore him at fourscore to the vigour of forty, the vizier had, unknown to my master, called in a new ally; the very person whose lynx eye Yacoob dreaded more than the spectacles of all the imperial moonedjims put together, namely, the chief physician of the seraglio. No wonder that on beholding the crabbed visage of this crusty Triestene the first thing one morning, as he came triumphantly with a phial of soap-suds and cinnamon, which he swore would renovate the last defunct musty himself, poor Yacoob should have looked as if he saw the Medusa. He however had presence of mind enough to dash the phial to pieces, and then to be in despair at the accident. It gave him, in the pretence of running home to repair the loss, a decent opportunity of making his retreat, with the full determination never more to go near the pasha's door. This availed him little. The old devil of a Triestene, who at his exit sent after him the ugliest grin I ever beheld, had our characters inquired into; and, satisfied that we practised unlawfully, denounced our doings to the president of the killing college. The vizier, the more incensed at being duped, from the pleasure he promised himself in bringing together two such eminent men as the Hebrew and the Christian doctors, threw in his weight against us, and the consequence was, our being sentenced to an exemplary punishment. As we sat brooding over the misfortune of the pasha's proving less a fool than we thought, a posse of police myrmidons entered to ransack our shop, and to take us to prison. These gentlemen, however, as usual, began their official functions by emptying all our phials and gallipots into their stomachs. This proceeding and its consequences, caused us a short respite.

While our first guardians were engaged, a new set was to be sent for; but these conveyed us without further delay to the place of our confinement. The very hour I had destined for consoling the fair Fathmé in her prison, I was ushered into that of the Bagnio.*

* Bagnio—the vast enclosure near the arsenal which serves as a prison to the Christian captives, and the Turkish and Rayah criminals.

CHAPTER VI.

THE vast and high enclosure of the Bagnio, situated contiguously to the arsenal and the docks, contains a little world of its own, but a world of wailing! One part is tenanted by the prisoners made on board the enemy's ships, who, with an iron ring round their legs, await in this dismal repository their transference on board the Turkish fleet. This part may only be called a sort of purgatory. The other is hell in perfection. It is the larger division, filled with the natural subjects of the grand signor, whom their real or supposed misdemeanors have brought to the abode of unavailing tears. Here are confined alike the ragged beggar urged by famine to steal a loaf, and the rich banker instigated by avarice to deny a deposit; the bandit who uses open violence, and the baker who employs false weights; the land robber and the pirate of the seas, the assassin and the cheat. Here, as in the infernal regions, are mingled natives of every country—Turks, Greeks, Armenians, Jews, and Gipsies; and are confounded individuals of every creed—the Mahomedan, the Christian, the Hebrew, and the Heathen. Here the proud and the humble, the opulent and the necessitous, are reduced to the direst of equalities, the equality of torture. But I err: for should some hapless victim—perhaps guilty of no other crime but that of having excited the sultan's cupidity,—still wear on his first entrance the livery of better days, his more decent appearance will only expose him to harsher treatment. Loaded with the heaviest fetters, linked to the most loathsome of malefactors, he is compelled to purchase every alleviation of his burthen, every mitigation of his pain, at the most exorbitant price; until the total exhaustion of his slender store has acquired him the privilege of being at least on a level with the lowest of his fellow-sufferers; and spared additional torments, no longer lucrative to their inflictors.

Every day a capital fertile in crimes pours new offenders into this dread receptacle; and its high walls and deep recesses resound every instant with imprecations and curses, uttered in all the various idioms of the Othoman empire. Deep moans and dismal yells leave not its answering echoes a moment's repose. From morning until night, and from night until morning, the ear is stunned with the clang of chains, which the galley-slaves drag about while confined in their cells, and which they still drag about when toiling at their tasks. Linked together two and two for life, should they sink under their sufferings, they still continue thus linked after the death of either; and the man doomed to live on drags after him the corpse of his dead companion. In no direction can the eye escape the spectacle of atrocious punishments and of indescribable agonies. Here perhaps you see a wretch, whose stiffened limbs refuse their office, stop suddenly short in the midst of his labour, and, as if already impassible, defy the stripes that lay open his flesh, and wait in total immobility the last merciful blow that is to end his misery; while, there, you view his companion foaming with rage and madness, turn against his own person his desperate hands, tear his clotted hair, rend his bleeding bosom, and dash to pieces his head against the wall of his dungeon.

A long-unpunished pirate, a liberated galley-slave, Achmet-reïs by name, was the fiend of hell who, by his ingenuity in contriving new tortures, and his infernal delight in beholding new sufferings, had deserved to become the chief inspector of this place, and the chief minister of its terrors. His joys were great, but they were not yet complete. Only permitted thus far to exercise his craft on mortals, he still was obliged to calculate what degree of agony the human frame could bear, and to proportion the pain he inflicted to the powers of suffering which man possessed, lest, by despatching his victims too soon, he should defeat his own aim. He was not yet received among his brother demons, in the blissful abodes where torments do not kill, and where the sufferer's pangs might be increased in an infinite ratio.

Of this truth the very hour of my arrival had afforded him a sorely lamented proof! An Armenian cashier, suspected of withholding from the sultan—sole heir to all his officers—the deposit of a deceased pasha, had just been delivered over into Achmet's hands; and many were the days of bliss to which the executioner looked forward in the diligent performance of his office. On the first application of the rack, out of sheer malice, the seraff expired:

Two days later, the whole of Achmet's prospects of sublunary happiness were near coming to a close. Some wretches, driven by his cruelty to a state of madness, had sworn his destruction. Their hands, tied behind their backs, could be of no use to them in effecting their purpose. They determined to crush him with their bodies. All at the same instant fell with their whole weight upon the executioner, or upon their own companions already pressing to the ground the prostrate monster, in hopes of burying his corpse under a living tumulus. But Achmet's good star prevailed:—ere yet his suffocation was completed, soldiers rescued the miscreant. He recovered, to wreak on his disappointed enemies his fiercest vengeance. Their punishment was dreadful! Sanguinary, but not cruel, prone to shed blood in anger, yet shuddering at torture, I was horror-struck at the scene, and the yells of the victims still ring in my ears.

Characters meet at large in the world which may almost count as sure their meeting again, some time or other, within the narrow precincts of the Bagnio. Of this species was the captain of the Maynote pirates who took our Venetian cutter. He now occupied his winter-quarters among the galley-slaves. Though I had had but little time on our first interview to cultivate his acquaintance, I could not help remembering that, from the moment his tall commanding figure rose above the side of our vessel, and stepped on board, my stars had assumed a milder aspect, and my situation had been improved. Each, therefore, was glad of the rencontre; each expressed his sincere pleasure at meeting the other; each politely hoped the other might be destined to stay a good while in the place.

There are men so gifted, as, in whatever situation fate may place them, still to inspire a certain awe and respect; and though fallen through dint of adverse circumstances into the most abject condition, still to retain over all around them an innate superiority. Of this sort was Mackari. He had been one of the chieftains of that small tribe of mountaineers, pent up in the peninsula of Mayno, who, like greater nations, claim dominion over the seas that gird their native rocks. He had only considered himself as acting conformably to his natural right, in capturing the vessels that trespassed on his domain without purchasing his permission; and in his conduct he discerned neither injustice nor treachery. His lofty soul, therefore, still preserved all its dignity amid his fallen fortunes. Patient under every insult, unruffled by torture, he was never heard to utter a sigh, to offer a remonstrance, or to beg a mitigation of his sufferings. Even when his keepers, unable to wrest from his scornful lip the smallest acknowledgment of their ingenuity in torturing, began to doubt their own powers, and, irritated at his very forbearance, resolved to conquer by a last and highest outrage his immoveable firmness; when with weights and pulleys they forced down to the ground that countenance, which, serene in the midst of suffering, seemed only fit to face the heavens; when they compelled him, whose mental independence defied all their means of coercion, constantly to behold the fetters that contracted his body, they only succeeded to depress his earthly frame; they were not able to lower his unbending spirit. Still calm, still serene as before, he only smiled at the fresh chains with which he was loaded; and at each new fetter added to his former shackles, his mind only seemed to take a loftier flight.

Yet, impassible as he appeared to his own woes, was he most feelingly alive to those of his companions. Of every new hardship which threatened to increase their sufferings, he uniformly stood forward to court the preference; and while his fortitude awed into silence the useless complaints of his troop, his self-devotion still relieved its real misery. One day when a ferocious soldier was going to fell with his club the comrade of Mackari's fetters, whom his manacled hands could not save from the blow, he opposed to the frightful weapon all he could command—his arm; which, broken by the stroke, fell by his side a wreck.

Thus did the Maynote captain's former crew still view in their chief, though loaded with irons like themselves, not only the master to whom they continued to pay all the obedience they could show, but the protector on whom they depended for all the comfort they could receive. His very keepers were unable in his sight to shake off the awe felt by all who approached him. They confessed by their fears their nothingness in his presence; they scarce could derive a sufficient sense of security from all the fetters which they had heaped upon their victim! In vain would he himself, with a bitter and disdainful smile, point to his forlorn state, and ask what they apprehended from one on whom they might trample with impunity?

The mere sound of his voice seemed to belie his words. It was the roar of a lion, dreaded even when emitted through the bars of his cage. And when with shackles somewhat loosened in order to perform his daily labour, Mackari was enabled to raise his head and to resume his erect posture,—when his majestic forehead shone far above the brows of his tallest companions,—he looked like the cedar of Lebanon, which, though scathed by the lightning from heaven, still overtops all the trees of the forest; and the wretches to whose care he was committed used immediately to recede to a fearful distance.

Unendowed with any of the forbearance of the Maynote chief, I had scarce been an hour in the Bagnio before I began to measure with my eye the height of its walls, to consider the strength of its gates, and to count the number of its guards. A good-natured fellow-sufferer, who guessed my thoughts, called me aside. “Take care what you do,” whispered he; “there is danger even in looking at these walls. The mere suspicion of a plan to escape from this place meets with the severest punishment; the execution is impossible. Should you have succeeded so far as to clear every impediment, every barrier, every sentinel,—should you have reached the very heart of the city,—should you in its seemingly impenetrable vortex think yourself most secure from any search,—you have yet achieved nothing; you have not advanced a single step towards your liberation. Many inmates of the Bagnio, possessing families in the city, enjoy unrestrained regress on the express condition of bringing back the missing, or of taking their place. The most active and watchful of the spies they employ are stationed precisely wherever the security from discovery seems the greatest; and the sufferings of those whose attempts at evasion have been baffled by their vigilance are so cruelly aggravated, that a man must have lost all hope of any other deliverance on this side the grave, ere he attempt so desperate a mode of regaining his freedom.”

Not such was my case. As soon as, recovering from my first dismay I had begun to cast my eye around, it had been arrested by a neat little spire with a handsome gilded top, peeping over the battlements of the western enclosure, and which somehow struck me as an old acquaintance. No wonder that it should; it crowned that very pavilion of the arsenal where the drogueman held his office, where sat Mavroyeni, where I myself had performed with applause my first part on the stage of the capital. An immediate gleam of hope beamed from its golden ball and glanced on my mind. "How!" thought I, "Mavroyeni, my old master, shall spend all his mornings within a stone's throw of the place in which pines his Anastasius; shall only be impeded by the thickness of a wall from seeing his hapless favourite; shall almost in the midst of his business hear the moans of his suffering servant; and if applied to, can he refuse to relieve me? Impossible! He needs only know where I am, and what miseries I experience, to restore me, not perhaps to his pristine favour, but to the common privilege of living, or at least of dying, where I choose."

My only doubt was, whether I should demean myself so far as to implore his intercession. This scruple, however, one of my satellites soon helped me to get over by an opportune application of his switch—only to keep his hand in practice—just as I was weighing the pros and cons. Accordingly I adjured the first fellow-prisoner who was liberated, by all that was sacred, to acquaint the drogueman with my confinement, and to lay before him my petition. I must confess, that there was nothing the good-natured creature did not promise in his joy to do for me; but there I rather imagine his generosity stopped. Though he had sworn that the sun should not set before he spoke in my behalf, the sun set and rose, and set and rose again, and I heard nothing more of the fate of my request. I hereupon repeated it to another person allowed to leave the Bagnio, and after him to a third, and to a fourth; but always with the same result. All professed equal readiness to serve me, but all either were alike forgetful of their promise, or unsuccessful in their application; for no notice was taken of me by Mavroyeni. In vain I lingered day after day in wearying suspense and feverish expectation! In vain I questioned every new face that appeared! No one knew any thing of my business; no one had heard my name mentioned. At last, I became convinced that the drogueman was determined to leave me to my fate, and I resolved to give up all further hopes of being freed, at least by the hand of man. I say "by the hand of man;" for a higher power was beginning to manifest its awful presence, which held out a prospect of speedy release, not only to me, but to the whole Bagnio. This was the plague.

The scourge had been expected for some time. By several of the prisoners had the frightful hag, its harbinger, been distinctly seen hovering with her bat's wings over our drear abode, and with her hooked talons numbering one by one her intended but still unsuspecting victims. In the silence of the night she had been heard leisurely calling them by their names, knocking at their several doors, and marking with livid spots the damp walls of their cells.*

Nothing but the visitation of this destructive monster seemed wanting to complete the horrors which surrounded me; for if even when only stalking forth among men free to fly from its approach and to shrink from its contact, the gaunt spectre mows down whole nations like the ripe corn in the field, it may be imagined what havoc ensues when it is permitted to burst forth from the inmost bowels of hell, in the midst of wretches close-wedged in their dungeons, or linked together at their tasks, whom it must trample down to the last ere it can find a vent in space. It is there, that with a focus of infection ready-formed, a train of miasma ready laid on every side, though this prime minister of death strike at random, it never misses its aim, and its progress outstrips the quickness of lightning or of thought. It is there that even those who thus far retain full possession of health, already calculate the hours they still may live; that those who to-day drag to their last abode their lifeless companions, to-morrow are laid beside them; and that those who are dying make themselves pillows of the bodies not yet cold of those already dead. It is there that finally we may behold the grim destroyer, in one place awaited in gloomy silence, in another encountered with fell imprecations, here implored with anxious cries, there welcomed with eager thanks, and now, perhaps, received with convulsive laughter and mockery by such as, trying to drink away its terrors, totter on the brink of the grave, from drunkenness as well as from disease.

The before busy-bee-hive of the Bagno, therefore, soon became a dreadful solitude. Its spacious enclosures, so lately teeming with tenants of every description, now began to present a void still more frightful than its former fulness. Universal silence pervaded those endless galleries but a few days before re-echoing with the confused din of thousands of prisoners, fighting for an inch of ground on which to lay their aching heads; and nothing any longer appeared that wore a human shape, except here and there some livid skeleton, which, as if again cast up by the grave, slowly crept along the clammy walls. When, however, the dire disease had devoured all that could offer food to its voracity, it gradually fell like the flame which has consumed its fuel, and at last became extinct. What few miserable remains of the former population of the Bagnio had escaped its fury were again restored to the regular sufferings of the place, suspended during the utmost height of the desolation.

I was among these scanty relics. I who, indifferent to life, had never stooped to avoid the shafts of death, even when they flew thickest around me—had more than once laid my finger on the livid wound they inflicted—had probed it as it festered—I yet remained unhurt: for sometimes the plague is a magnanimous enemy, and, while it seldom spares the pusillanimous victim, whose blood, running cold ere it is tainted, loses the energy necessary to repel the infection when at hand, it will pass him by who dares its utmost fury, and advances undaunted to meet its raised dart.

Not that my old master Yacoob can be quoted as another instance in point. He too escaped, indeed; but it was from any thing but an excess of courage. Probably, the plague thought his former campaigns in her cause, as an old-clothesman, should not be forgotten in his later acts of hostility as a physician. Little trusting, however, to the generosity of his old ally, who might consider the obligation repaid by the ample stock of goods she occasionally had procured him, his mind had, during the progress of the disease, brought forth nothing but plans of evasion. Each later device, indeed, miscarried, as all the former had done before it; but this was only to give birth to some plan still later, and more preposterous. One day, astride on the lofty summit of the outer wall which surrounds the prison, he had nearly given his enfeebled guardians the slip, by softly letting himself down upon a heap of rubbish, thrown up outside, as if on purpose to break his fall; when, most unluckily espied, he was hauled down to receive a hundred lashes on the soles of his feet, for the nimble use he had made of them. This castigation, inflicted, must have ended his troubles. Fortunately, he had laboured before under a suspicion of madness: and so violent a paroxysm of raving now suddenly seized him, that some of the by-standers began to think an hospital fitter for his residence than a prison. The sacredness of insanity saved his skin. The keepers durst not execute the sentence passed upon him; and Achmet, to whom a treat in his own way was, of late, become a rarity, since the plague had begun to rob him of his pleasures, walked off, sorely disappointed, and devoutly praying God to deliver the Bagnio from all such madmen!

Yacoob's contrivances to be released from his confinement did not end here. He had got by heart all the prayers of the Mohammedans, and secretly made himself perfect in all the accompanying gestures. One morning, after he had attracted the eye of a Turkish visiter of some distinction, he suddenly fell on his face, crying, "he saw the prophet, and was not only bidden by him to embrace Islamism,* but actually instructed how to perform its rites;"—of which indeed he forthwith acquitted himself with great dexterity. The bait took with the stranger; but the farce was laughed at by the familiars of the place, who told Yacoob, he might go to the mosque, if he chose, but reminded him that there was one in the Bagnio. This damped his religious ardour; and the vision sneaked off, as visions do. Still did he, from time to time, repeat his grimaces; and he was always observed to invoke Allah most lustily, when a stranger came in sight, whose heart he had hopes of moving. It was curious to see the holy violence with which, on these occasions, he went through his Namaz,† until large drops of perspiration trickled down his greasy face. No disappointment had power to stop these pious but unavailing exercises.

He and I herded little together. The ordinary companion of my toil was a young Greek, nearly of my own age; but from his less elevated stature, his rounded features, and his more delicate complexion, seemingly, three or four years younger. His dress, though at the time rather the worse for wear, preserved an appearance of something beyond mere neatness, or even costliness: it had a sort of studied, and, what would be called in Christendom, theatrical elegance. His gait and manners corresponded. They too offered, not an air of quality, but a species of recherche carried beyond natural grace. This artificial exterior, this refinement of appearance, were the more remarkable, from the simplicity of mind, the singleness of heart (if I may so say), on which they seemed super-structed. The varnish penetrated not beyond the surface. Yet there it adhered pertinaciously; and, with the most sincere and heart-felt piety, Anagnosti never fell upon his knees to say his prayers without an air, and never rose from his devotions without a grace. He, himself, when aware of these superfluous ornaments, blushed, and would have given all he possessed to shake them off: but they clung to him in his own despite. Sometimes I used to rally him on a semblance of affectation, so little suited to our abode, and so discordant with his real character. "Is it my fault?" cried he, one day. "If the plant has so long been trained to formal symmetry, can the utmost neglect, itself, immediately recall its primitive ease and wildness? The subject, as you may have observed, is one I do not like to think of, and hitherto have carefully avoided: but your good-nature assures me of your pity. Hear my story, and judge."

CHAPTER VI.

"My father," continued Anagnosti, "was proesti* of Stavro: Phonea gave birth to my revered mother—"

"No doubt," cried I, interrupting him, "all the world knows these two important places; but fancy me very ignorant, and tell me where they lie?"

"Near Corinth," answered the youth, somewhat surprised, and resumed his tale.

"The inhabitants of Phonea," said he, "justly boast of their proficiency in the mysteries of divination. This art formed my mother's principal portion. Unfortunately, her skill made her foresee every calamity, but it found a cure for none; and she spent her life in bewailing her sorrowful endowments. Those of my father were of a different cast. They consisted not so much in doubling present evils by the fear of future mischiefs, as in making the best of the ills we laboured under. When, therefore, one evening, a troop of Arnoots,—in order to pay themselves for the unwelcome protection they had afforded us against the Russians,—plundered our house, made firewood of our olive-trees, and turned out our cattle into our vineyards, my much-respected father observed, how fortunate was this misfortune, as we possessed at Salonica a rich relation, who would do better for us than we could do for ourselves—unless, as my mother added, with a shake of the head, he should be dead or ruined.

“This kinsman we determined to seek out. Leaving our patrimony at the mercy of the waywode, as a trifling acknowledgment for his trouble in selling us to the robbers, we bade adieu to our native land, which never had looked more charming than it did at that moment, and set out upon our journey. My father trusted for our travelling expenses to the charity, with which, he was sure, Providence would inspire every mortal we met; while my mother trembled lest we should only meet banditti. If any thing could move the hardest heart, it certainly was our procession. Imagine, first, a man already in years, loaded with the scanty wrecks of his property; next, a woman, pale and emaciated, and borne down by illness, with a baby at the breast, and leading another by the hand, hardly able to follow; while myself, between two little girls, one of ten, and one of twelve, in a most tattered condition, brought up the rear. We did not beg, for we knew not the way; but we looked wretchedness itself: and sometimes we found relief; and to those that bestowed it we gave, in return, all that we had to give, our blessing. As, however, we advanced on the journey, we began to need less assistance. This my mother had said would happen, and she, herself, was the one that accomplished her prediction. Sinking under her grief, she turned out of the path, sat down on a stone, and urged us to proceed, for she could go no farther. I threw my arms round her neck, tried to cheer her, and sobbed. ‘Oh my Anagnosti,’ said she, as she pressed my little fingers within her clammy hand, and fixed on my countenance her anxious, boding look—‘O my curly-headed boy! remember your poor mother’s last words: let others fear their foes; you, my sweet innocent, beware only of your friends!’ Then, in convulsive agony, she clasped me to her breast, laid down her head, and died.

“Much as my mother’s weakness had retarded our progress, her decease was the only event in which my father could not at first see any advantage. Long he wept for his loss; and at last he dug a grave by the roadside, at which we all helped to work. In it was buried my poor mother—all but this lock of hair, which shall only return to dust with her child.

“Just as we again set forward from the dismal spot the baby, which long had pined, expired for want of sustenance. We would not divide in death what in life had thus far still been as one: and, turning back, deposited the child in the lap of its tender parent:—they sleep together!

“My father now observed, ‘it was better for my mother to be dead than to suffer; and my little brother was provided for.’ Still he never ceased to weep until we arrived at Volo. A lady of that place, who had lost an only child, took such a fancy to my rosy face that she begged to have it. Her nauseous kisses had stamped it hers already! After my mother’s, I could not bear them. My father was but indifferently inclined to part with his Anagnosti—the only one of his children who, in all his looks and sayings, reminded him of his Zoë: but he was poor; he thought that his loss would be my advantage, and he only proceeded on with the other three. I staid, to cry, and to be kissed.

“At Salonica my father found that his affluent relation had died a bankrupt, as my mother had predicted. ‘This,’ he observed, ‘must make him return to the labours of the field, which, after all, were the healthiest.’ Alas! in the damp deleterious country we had got into, they carried him off. It was what my mother knew would happen. In a quarrel with a neighbour at home, she had heard the spiteful wretch wish my father a seven years’ ague.* The disease only took seven months to bring him to the grave; and this he thought a great mercy. While ill, he remembered that one day in the fields, on suddenly turning round, he had seen his fellow-labourers stamp on his shadow. How could he after that be expected to live? At the last gasp, his eye lighted up at the thoughts of rejoining his Zoë! Charitable persons took in the little orphans: I sent them the few pence I had collected; but alas! my little hoard evaporated by the way!

* A seven years’ ague—the liberal wish of an enemy in a country replete with malaria.

"My own good fortune was of short duration. The old lady at Volo who had promised to adopt me, changed her fondness into aversion when she found how dearly I loved to play in puddles, and how little I liked to be kissed. She scolded me for being a boy; and sighed to think what a tidy little girl she might have had in my place, who never for an instant would have quitted her side. The first of these faults I acknowledged, and observed that she might have been aware of it before; and as for the other grievance, I told her, 'If I could not always stay by her side, I could do the next best thing, which was, never to go near her again.' She made no reply, and I ran away.

"As I had always promised the holy Virgin faithfully to divide with her whatever I might earn, I made no doubt that she would direct me well in my search for a livelihood. I cannot think she did; though it might be for my good. She made me engage on board a Hydriote* laden with corn for the Black Sea. A single family formed the crew, from the captain down to the lowest cabin-boy. But to that family poor Anagnosti belonged not; and when all the rest in a calm used to dance on the deck, I alone was left out, to listen to their mirth in the hold. Alas! I have since had dancing enough! At the time, however, I thought the hardship so great, that I begged of the captain, on my knees, to let me dance with the rest, and to flog me afterward as much as he pleased. Had he granted my petition, I might not have had leisure to discover, as I did, how ill my amphibious life suited my abilities, or agreed with my duty to the Panagia. I therefore resolved to abandon it. The moment we touched at Constantinople I took to my heels, not doubting to find an easy subsistence in a place where, as I had heard, the streets were paved with silver, and the houses roofed with gold. For two long days I waded knee deep in mire; only sleeping all night in the cinders of the public baths, and in the morning without a morsel to break my fast. So great became my hunger, that, at a sudden turn, which brought me opposite a cook-shop near the Tophana,† the sight of a plate of smoking kiebabs,* just taken out of the oven, almost bereft me of my senses. Not daring to approach, I involuntarily fell on my knees, and half-worshipped the dear hissing cutlets at a distance. An ill-looking fellow saw the action, and guessing the motive, told me, 'if I was hungry, to come along with him : I should not want for bread, as he was a baker.' He wanted a shopboy ; and hard as it might seem for the son of a proësti of Stavro to sell rolls at Constantinople, my stomach audibly groaned the words, 'necessity has no law!'

"My apprenticeship was short. The very second day of my ministry, after a flying visit from a Turk, my master came up to me, and said, 'he liked me so well, he had determined immediately to give me a share in the business ; and I had nothing to do—whoever might call—but to say the concern was my own.' On this my principal ran out, leaving me in astonishment at my speedy promotion.

"A person did call ; and I did say the concern was my own : but as that person was the Stamboul effendee,† who had set apart that day for weighing the weights and for measuring the measures of the different tradesmen ; the deficiency he found in ours made him—though very condescending and chatty at first—end by ordering that I should be dealt by as I dealt by my loaves ; namely, baked in my own oven. In this consisted the chief advantage I was to derive from the partnership.

"My cries of 'Aman'‡ at this intemperate sentence brought out the whole neighbourhood. It knew my master's character, vouched for mine without knowing it, and through dint of strenuous intercession, moved the effendee to such excess of lenity, as, in regard for my innocence, only to order me three dozen strokes on the soles of my feet.

"The change, undoubtedly, was to my advantage ; yet did I feel so angry, that I swore rather to go without bread all the days of my life, than ever again to trust to a baker. Lame as I was, I tried to hobble away. An odd-looking man, who had been eying me all along from head to foot, asked me whether I loved dancing. The question seemed insulting ; but, lest I should commit myself, I neither answered yes or no. 'You have been ill used,' added he; 'my compassionate heart moves me to take you home and cure your bruises.' I fancied not the man's countenance, but my feet told me not to mind his face, and I saw the less of it as he took me on his back. While riding along I conceived very sinister forebodings; but when set down where we stopped, I smiled at my fears. Nothing could look less terrific than the place of my destination. Around the walls hung suspended by elegant cords and tassels, lutes, cimbals, guitars, and other musical instruments, inlaid with mother-of-pearl. The richest dresses were airing at the windows; and if the habitation resembled any one thing more than another, it was a temple of mirth. In fact, when restored, by wholesome applications both outward and within, to my pristine condition, I asked what I could do in return for so much hospitality? the answer was, 'to dance.'

"I immediately fell a capering. But this was not the thing meant. My host—a Greek of Seyra—had in his youth been a dancer by profession. Age having stiffened his joints, he now gained his livelihood by giving suppleness to younger limbs. He had a number of boys whom he trained to perform ballets in the conaes or palaces of the great. His eye had been caught by my nimbleness when about to be put into the oven, and he roused my ambition by pledging himself to make me a first-rate dancer.

"The greatest natural genius still requires the assistance of culture. For a while I toiled beyond conception. But as I never attempted a difficult step without addressing the Panagia, I at last succeeded. I may say without vanity, I acquired the perfection of the art. The exactness of my poise, the precision of my movements, the apparent ease with which I performed the most difficult steps—people maintained—were positively sublime. From the ends of my fingers to the tip of my toes, all was expression and sentiment. The best connoisseurs declared that in me alone they had found the poetry of the heel; and my very shadow was lighter than other people's shadows. But I do not wish to praise myself!

"That I became celebrated I need not tell. Every other dancer was voted execrable. Whenever I appeared, I was stunned with applause before I moved a step; and the spectators were in trances at my performance of what in others would have been hissed; for it was not always that I exerted my best abilities. With indifferent judges I scarce would stir; and even with the best I sometimes had my bad days, when all the coaxing in the world could not draw out my powers. Once I felt so ill in reality, that another dancer was sent out in my clothes, who, accomplishing with evident effort what I performed with ease, made the blockheads declare that I never yet had danced so well as I did that evening.

“My emoluments kept pace with my celebrity. At each pause in my exhibitions my forehead used to be studded with gold coins;* and at the conclusion of the performance, heaps of sequins showered from all sides into my spangled cap. Who then could have fancied me otherwise than happy? But it is one thing to divert others, and it is another to taste of joy one’s self! The constant fatigue, the sense of dependence, the fear of not succeeding, the liability to the humours of a capricious audience, the danger of losing the attraction of novelty, the chance of being eclipsed by some abler competitor, are alone dreadful drawbacks on a profession like mine. Yet with me they were minor evils. Keener sufferings peculiar to myself assailed me, and that in general by preference just when my situation seemed most enviable. For it was almost always in the intoxication and flurry of spirits produced by the exertions I made, by the bravos I excited, and by the crowds of people, the glare of lights, and the din of instruments I moved among, that the image of my deceased mother, as she appeared in her last moments, would rise with most distinctness to my heated fancy. And often have I, between the several acts of the entertainment, retired to some lonely corner to weep at liberty, while the whole assembly seemed in ecstasies of pleasure. It is true, that if dancing produced melancholy, melancholy more than once in its turn produced dancing. Sometimes, in the sort of phrensy brought on by the clang of a full band, I have started up, and like the mewlewi derwishes,† have reeled round the room like a person intoxicated; until, completely exhausted, I fell senseless on the floor.

“To add to the discomforts of my situation, I was not even allowed to retain the hard-earned fruits of my labour.

* My forehead used to be studded with gold coins—Turkish mode of rewarding public dancers and singers.

† The Mewlewi Derwishes—sort of Turkish friars, who in their devout exercises twirl round in their tekkie of chapel, like tops.

Of the gold which I gained by the sweat of my brow not a penny remained my own, except what in the evening, when I crossed the cemetery of Galata, I had the address to slip into a hollow tree, or to drop behind a mouldering tombstone, where the crows often were the first to find my little store. The moment I got home from our nightly exhibition I was regularly searched, and every farthing found about me went into my master's pocket, as his pay for my board, lodging, and maintenance. Enraged at his illiberality, I one evening threw my gilt jacket in his face, saying I wished to keep nothing that was his, but would go and exercise my talent, naked as I stood, on my own account. Hereupon the vampire—the odious blood-sucker, brought against me such a bill for bestowing that talent of which he said I wanted to rob him, as must have left me all my life a mere drudge—a puppet moving at his nod—had I not determined to settle the account my own way.

“In fact, now clearly discerning the whole drift of the hospitality which the Scyrote so kindly had afforded me, I henceforth watched my opportunity to slip away from the ballet-master at Galata, as I had done from the lady at Volo, the Hydriote captain, and the fraudulent baker. This was not an easy matter. Our manager was vigilance personified, and never allowed me to go out of his sight. An accident befriended me. One of my companions had long cherished the greatest envy of my superiority. In a pas de deux we performed together as a lover and his mistress; he kicked my shins; I boxed his ears; he retorted by breaking on my head the guitar with which he was serenading me, and scratching my face in such a manner that, the next time the troop went out I was left at home as unfit to be seen. Whatever might ail my head, my heels were in good order; I took to them as usual; and never stopped till I had reached the quarter most remote from where the Scyrote lived.

“Here I might dance on my own account as much as I pleased, but found nobody to dance to, except the lowest rabble. In retiring out of my master's latitude I had outstepped my own vantage ground. From exhibiting in palaces to assemblies of the great, amid showers of gold, I was reduced to toil in taverns for the amusement of ruffians, who thought a few paras a very liberal reward; after perhaps mortifying my pride into the bargain, by invidious comparisons with some arrant posture-maker. Obligated to lower the tone of my performance to the standard of my new patrons, I lost all that finish and delicacy of movement for which my dancing had been celebrated, and dwindled into little better than a tumbler.

"Nor was this all. One night, after drudging to amuse a set of brutes, I met with such ill treatment from the Bacchantes their companions, as to make me expect, with my poor lyre, the end of Orpheus. Thank God! the Panagia—knowing how observant I always had been of her festivals—protected me even against her own sex, and my poor life was saved, little worth as it was. This signal escape led me to serious reflections.

"I had always been punctual in my prayers, both before dancing and after; and had as yet committed no very heinous sin, save once on a fast day eating some nice yaoort,* which a Turk gave me after a long performance; but I did not know what worse might happen in my daily intercourse with infidels; and I determined to avoid the danger by quitting a profession which, if distinguished, is also dangerous, and full of hazard to one's faith and morals.

"Alas! I was too late to execute my good intentions! My special admirers meeting at a tavern with the professed supporters of a rival dancer, the two factions came to a pitched battle, in which a life or two were lost, while I—the innocent cause of the disturbance—was taken up by the patrol, and thrown into this place of wretchedness, more than ever convinced of the truth of all my honoured mother's predictions. For what were the old lady of Volo, who washed her hands of me when I would kiss her no longer; the Hydriote captain, who would not let me dance with my messmates, after giving me shelter on board his ship; the baker who first fed, and next slyly destined me to a snug corner in his oven; the Scyrote, who cured, who entertained, and afterward robbed me of all my lawful gains; and the caleonjees, who went about my zealous champions, in order to get me almost torn to pieces limb by limb, and locked up in the Bagnio—but so many persons at first all professing themselves my staunch and trusty friends!—and such is the horror with which that word now inspires me, that, were I to hear the Panagia call herself my friend, great as hitherto has been her goodness, I should expect her to end by playing me some scurvy trick."

Here ended my companion's tale—the faithful picture of his mind; in which moral rectitude and affection were strangely combined with conceit, credulity, and bigotry. In the wide range of social intercourse, this odd mixture might not have taken much hold on the harder materials of my composition; nor should I greatly have coveted an intimacy with the character of a stage dancer grafted on a peasant; but in the narrow precincts of the Bagnio fastidiousness wears out, and constant juxtaposition produced different sentiments; and the more, as athwart Anagnosti's apparent facility of temper and warmth of heart, there broke forth a sort of determined sturdiness on certain points, which all the laxity of his education and companions never had overcome, and which, inclined as one might be to smile at his studied exterior, made one feel a sort of respect for the stuff within. Insensibly, therefore, an attachment grew between us, which, though it daily increased, gave my companion no alarm, until one day I observed what alleviation our misery had derived from our friendship. At this unguarded speech Anagnosti turned pale. "Friendship!" repeated he; "say not so! It will again bring me ill fortune. Like the rest of my friends, you will ultimately be my bane."

"Words," answered I, laughing, "cannot alter the nature of things. We certainly at this moment are friends, and warm ones too: for I believe each would willingly lay down his life for the other; and even if the dangers of friendship should now make us resolve to become bitter enemies, it would already be too late to seek safety from a future evil in a present one. The mischief is done; the spell is upon you."

"Then," said Anagnosti, after ruminating a little, "if we cannot be less than friends, let us be more! Let us become brothers; let religion sanctify our intimacy, so as to divest it of its dangers:" and upon this he proposed to me the solemn ceremony,* which, in our church, unites two friends of either sex in the face of the altar by solemn vows, gives them the endearing appellation of brothers or sisters, and imposes upon them the sacred obligation to stand by each other in life and death.

* The solemn ceremony—still in use in Albania, and along the eastern shore of the Adriatic.

Anagnosti, though he certainly had—in his different avocations—run away as often as he had stood his ground, and had, from his last mode of life, to appearance, derived a certain tinge of effeminacy, yet in reality was brave as well as affectionate. He had more than once resisted his guardians most manfully in their unjust behests; he had even defended me, one day that I lay ill and unable to defend myself, at the risk of his life, against a fellow-slave, who would have plunged a dagger in my breast, for the sake of my worn-out capote; and from his disposition there was every reason to expect that the fruits and the burthens of our alliance would be ever equally shared. The first day we were permitted, therefore, we went to a priest in the Bagnio, and desired the holy man, after the short service which our straitened means permitted, to accomplish the indissoluble union. At first the venerable papas treated the request as a jest. “The practice,” he said, “was quite obsolete, except among the most barbarous clans of the remotest provinces. Epirotes, and other savages, who like them lived in eternal strife, might indeed still retain such old customs, but the people at Constantinople were sufficiently employed in minding their own concerns, without gratuitously engaging to risk their lives for others.” This indirect remonstrance producing no effect, the priest warned us more earnestly to consider, before we irrevocably bound ourselves by so serious an engagement. Still we insisted, and he at last complied. He enveloped us in the sacred veil, symbol of the holy ties we contracted; and made us swear on our knees, in the face of Heaven, to share together like brothers, while we breathed, both good and adverse fortune.

The solemn vow pronounced, and Heaven fervently implored to bless it, we again rose. I shook Anagnosti by the hand, and could not refrain from saying, “Though now brothers, still friends as before.”

He involuntarily shuddered. All his fears recurred; and on casting off the sacred cincture, we found on it a fresh stain of blood. How it came there neither of us could guess. We searched for the cause: none could be discovered; and we at last forgot the evil omen.

The very period which saw our intimacy indissolubly riveted was fated to be that of our separation. Whether, at the time of my imprisonment, the length of my detention had been fixed: or whether (as I afterward suspected)

Mavroyeni, while apparently rejecting my application, in reality had procured my deliverance—one morning when I least expected it, I was bidden to quit the Bagnio. I say “bidden;” for, thinking the thing optional, I at first, in conformity with my sacred engagement, refused to accept my freedom, unless shared by my friend. But I now found myself as little allowed to stay in as I had before been to stay out of the Bagnio, at my pleasure. I must resume my liberty whether I chose or not, and was very near being driven by force out of prison—a rather unusual circumstance! Anagnosti tried to sweeten the bitterness of my release, by observing that it might be rendered instrumental in procuring his own. “Remember,” said he, “that in losing you, I lose all. O Anastasius, O my—friend! remember—”

Here his sobs interrupted his speech, and the guards, tired of our tedious leave-taking, tore us asunder. After proceeding on a few yards, I turned round to cast one more last look after my companion, but already the gates had been shut behind me: and I went forth—shaking off indeed the dust of my prison, and with all Constantinople open before me—but without a single particle of that rapturous joy at the heart which I always fancied must accompany the feeling of my liberation.

CHAPTER VIII.

To enjoy liberty one must live, and to live one must eat—and I had not a para in the world to purchase me a meal. In this embarrassing situation I thought of my old patron. If he really had procured my freedom, it was proper to thank him; if not, it still was wise to do so. In the first case, he might be induced by my sense of past kindness to seek greater claims still to my future gratitude; since benefactors often resemble gamblers, who double their stakes rather than they should lose the benefit of a first throw; and in the latter case, the thanks I gave for imaginary services would make the drogue-man wish to deserve them by real obligations. Gratitude I had often found most productive when it preceded the benefit. Besides, I had my friend Anagnosti to intercede for; and I was desirous to strike the iron while it was hot.

Most willingly would I have smartened myself up a little for the visit. Not only a tattered appearance smooths the way but indifferently athwart the outpost of pampered domestics, who guard the approaches of the great man's citadel; it often even makes the master himself ashamed of his petitioner. Rich people readily accuse the poor of wanting proper respect, when they offend the fastidious eye of pride by the display of their wretchedness. All, however, I could do was to arrange my rags gracefully; and repeating to myself, as I strutted along, that a man's innate dignity of mien and manners were a sufficient passport even with a king—I boldly went to the Fanar, and with the least possible tremor knocked at Mavroyeni's door.

It certainly opened at my summons, but not to let me enter. The porter who answered, holding it ajar in his hand, contrived to fill the whole aperture with his own person, until he had most leisurely surveyed mine. While thus examined, I recognised in my surveyor an old acquaintance. So it seems he did in me; for when I asked to see his master, he banged the door in my face, without a syllable of reply. It was just what I myself had done a dozen times when with Mavroyeni at Argos. The uncouth janitor's reception, therefore, I thought, must originate higher. Servants behaved not in this manner unless they felt their conduct sanctioned by their masters: for dependants instinctively know the antipathies of their patrons. "Hic thee hence, therefore, Anastasius," exclaimed I, "thou hast no longer any business near this threshold;" and hereupon I walked away.

At that instant the same door burst open again, and almost flew off its hinges. I looked back. It was to let out Mavroyeni himself. Convinced that an attempt to accost him would only expose me to fresh mortifications, I now felt as solicitous to avoid his eye as I had been before to be admitted to his presence. I hastily drew back my head, and passed on, or rather ran away, as if it had been an ignominy even to be seen near the drogue-man's abode.

Heated with my race, I rushed into the first coffee-house I saw open, and observing a large bowl of hoshab*

* Hoshab—a beverage made of fruit of various sorts.

most invitingly set out on the counter, greedily snatched up the basin, and gulped down the icy beverage. I had no earthly means of payment; but heaven came to my assistance. Exhausted with inanition, I felt too weak to resist the sudden chill. It struck me to the heart. I reeled backwards, and fell senseless on the floor.

How long the fit lasted I am unable to tell. All I know is, that when my senses returned I found myself in a smart jog trot, bumping at the back of a hamal, and travelling in this inconvenient posture at the rate of a league an hour, up one dirty lane and down another; but whither was more than I could guess.

I therefore made free to ask the question, and was but little pleased with the information this procured me. Convicted, by my sudden seizure, of a confirmed plague, the master of the shop had only felt desirous to get rid as soon as possible of so unwelcome a customer; and had called in the porter aforesaid, to convey me to the hospital. Thither I was speeding as fast as another man's legs could carry my body: for even during the above account my bearer slackened not his pace, but kept jogging on as lustily as before.

I took the liberty of representing that there was a mistake in the case. I might be ill indeed, but I was totally free from any infectious disorder. "Nothing more likely," answered the hamal; "but he was paid for the job, and must earn his fare;" and upon this he only grasped me somewhat tighter than before, lest, being less unwell than he had imagined, I might easier contrive to give him the slip. In vain I insisted upon being let loose, and excused from going where, if I brought not the plague, I was sure to find it. My expostulations were of no avail; and I therefore tried to liberate myself by pommelling the perverse porter with all my might. This was not very great, in my weak state; and the little impression I could make on the tough hide of my obstinate beast, instead of making him throw me off, only served to quicken his pace.

I now resorted to the last means of salvation in my power, fixed my claws in the brawny throat of the miscreant, and squeezed him almost to suffocation. Finding his load became too troublesome, he at last let me slip down from his back to the ground, swore I was the most refractory piece of goods he ever had carried, and left me, in order to seek elsewhere an easier fare.

One street appeared to me as good as another to die in; and my present sensations foreboded nothing else. I crawled to a stepping-stone near the place where I had been deposited, and on that pillow I resigned myself to my fate.

So near, in fact, seemed my exit, that a novelist, writing my history, would have availed himself of the circumstance happily to terminate his first volume, and to leave me irretrievably for dead in the opinion of his reader, until my unexpected resurrection at the beginning of volume the second. Writing in the first person, I cannot keep my friends and well-wishers in this state of agreeable suspense, or conceal from them one single moment that I lived on; but it was for some time in such wretchedness, as would not even leave the most fastidious critic any pretence to find fault with such a proceeding. One man passed by me, and another, and another, and several stopped and looked; but, when their curiosity was satisfied, all went on again, only shrugging up their shoulders. No one of my own sex offered me the least assistance. At last came two females. For several minutes ere they reached my resting-place, their incessant loquacity had warned me of their approach; but I was too ill to look up, and had closed my eyes. "Bless me," said the one, "I see something alive there!" "Bless me," said the other, "and so do I!" "A man!" cried the first. "A handsome youth I declare!" cried the second. "Unwell," rejoined the little one. "Dying, I fear," resumed the tall one. "How like Anastasius," exclaimed the former! "Himself, as I live!" replied the latter. "Then, indeed," continued the other, in a sagacious whisper, "I am very much afraid, neighbour, that he is not dying, but only dead drunk."—Enviably effects of a good name!

My character was now to me a matter of life and death.

"No," said I, therefore—making an effort to speak, but in a scarce audible voice:—"it is not drunkenness that oppresses me; it is suffering—it is starvation."

At this speech, the women both scream out in astonishment; both talk at the same time. They want to know the how, the when, the where. "Torment me not with questions," cried I, "but if you have any humanity, get me conveyed to St. Demetrius.* Pay the five piastres required for my admission ; and expect not to be repaid in this world." Saying this, I again fainted away.

The first perception which followed this second fit was that of an entirely new change of objects. The women had succeeded in their humane endeavours, and I was lying under a filthy coverlet, on a filthy pallet, in the filthy hospital in question, next to a dead man, whose pulse the would-be physician of the place was just in the act of feeling, assuring some bystanders that it was perfectly quiet, and no longer showed any symptoms of fever.

I shall not finish the picture of the disgusting abode, where, nevertheless, I had been introduced only out of sheer humanity. Suffice it to say, that under its truly hospitable roof every nuisance found a home, medicine alone excepted. A scanty charity was the chief support of the institution, and an unwieldy governor the chief object supported. Yet, after a fair contest between my constitution and my pleurisy, in which neither side received the least assistance from doubtful prescriptions, the former got the better. The father of nine helpless orphans expired by my side, and I recovered.

It was during my convalescence that I most forcibly felt all the wretchedness of my receptacle : it was during my convalescence, also, that I most fully owned my unworthiness of a better. "But," cried I, tossing about on my hard couch, "the deadliest poisons compose the most salutiferous medicines, and the direst calamities produce the best resolves. It will be my own fault if I rise not from this bed of sickness and suffering, both wiser and worthier!" Thus I spoke while my pulse still beat low, and my passions were still weak.

At last came the day which I fancied would never come—that of my release from the hospital. It dawned about a month after I had entered the dismal place. I sallied forth at midday : and indescribable was the rapture with which I first again breathed a pure air, and beheld the whole expanse of an azure sky.

Still was I as much as ever at a loss how to subsist. Absorbed in this weighty consideration, I slowly walked down the hill of St. Demetrius, when I fancied I discerned at a distance a caravan of travellers, who, with a slow and steady pace, were advancing towards Pera, the residence of the Franks at Constantinople. I mechanically quickened my pace, in order to survey the procession more closely.

First in the order of march came a clumsy calash, stowed as full as it could hold of wondering travellers; next came a heavy araba,* loaded with as many trunks, portmanteaus, parcels, and packages as it could well carry; and lastly, led up the rear a grim-looking Tartar,† keeping order among half a dozen Frank servants of every description, jogging heavily along on their worn-out jades. At this sight the droguemanic blood began to speak within me. "These are strangers, Anastasius," it whispered; "be thou their interpreter, and thy livelihood is secured." I obeyed the inward voice as an inspiration from heaven, and, after smartening myself up a little, approached the first carriage.

"Welcome to Pera, excellencies!" said I, with a profound bow, to the party within. At these words up started two gaunt figures in nightcaps, with spectacles on their noses and German pipes in their mouths, whose respective corners still kept mechanically puffing whiffs of smoke at each other. The first action which followed was to lay their hands on the blunderbusses hung round the carriage; but seeing me alone, on foot, and to all appearance not very formidable, they seemed after some consultation to think they might venture not to fire, and only kept staring at me in profound silence. I therefore repeated my salute in a more articulate manner, and again said, "Welcome, excellencies, to Pera, where you are most anxiously expected. As you will probably want a skilful interpreter, give me leave to recommend a most unexceptionable person—I mean myself. Respectable references, I know, are indispensable in a place where every one is on the watch to impose upon the unwary traveller; but such, I think, I can name. As to what character they may give me, that," added I, with a modest bow, "it becomes not your humble servant himself to state."

At so Christian-like a speech, uttered in the very heart of Turkey, the travellers grinned from ear to ear with delight. It produced another short consultation; after which the two chiefs cried out in chorus, "Oui chai pe-soin," and bade me mount by their side. This enabled me, after a little compliment on Germany, their birth-place, and on their proficiency in the French idiom, immediately to enter upon the duties of my office, for which I thought myself sufficiently qualified by the squibs which I had heard the drogueman of the Porte, Morosi, let off in company with my patron at the diplomatic corps of Pera.

"This edifice," said I, pointing to the first building of note in the suburb which we met on our way, "is the palace of the ich-oglauns—the sultan's pages. It is the most fruitful seminary of favourites, of pashas, and of sultanas' husbands.* In that direction lives that most respectable of characters, the imperial internuncio,† the Baron Herbert; who, with all the shrewdness of a thorough-paced minister, combines all the playful simplicity of a child. Further on dwells the French ambassador, Monsieur de Choiseul Gouffier—a very great man in little things; and opposite him lives his antagonist in taste, politics, and country, the English envoy, Sir Robert Ainslie, of whom the world maintains exactly the reverse. Quite at the bottom of the street, likewise facing each other, live the envoys of Russia and of Sweden.‡ The former I feel bound to respect, whatever be his merit; the latter really possesses much. He is an Armenian, who writes in French a history of Turkey. Lately he has made with his bookseller an exchange profitable to both, he having given his manuscript, and the other his daughter; that is to say, the Armenian a single voluminous work, and the Frenchman a brief epitome of his whole shop. Wedged in between the palaces of Spain and Portugal is that of the Dutch ambassador, whose name, Vandendiddem-totgelder,§ is almost too long for these short autumn days, and whose head is thought to be almost as long as his name; inasmuch as he regularly receives twice a-week the Leyden Gazette, which renders him beyond all controversy the best informed of the whole Christian corps diplomatique in respect of Turkish politics. You see, gentlemen, the representatives of all the potentates of Christendom, from Petersburg to Lisbon, and from Stockholm to Naples, are here penned up together in this single narrow street, where they have the advantage of living as far as possible from the Turks among whom they come to reside, and of watching all day long the motions of their own colleagues, from their most distant journeys to the Sublime Porte, to their most ordinary visits to the recesses at the bottom of their gardens."

† Internuncio—title given to the Austrian minister at Constantinople, in order to avoid conflicts of etiquette. Baron Herbert Rathkeal was equally venerated by Turks and by Christians.

‡ Envoy of Sweden—Mouradgea d'Odhson; an Armenian by birth, originally drogueman to the Swedish mission, and author of a celebrated work on the Ottoman empire.

These little specimens of my savoir-dire seemed to please my German friends. They immediately noted them down in their huge memorandum-books, which, no more than their short pipes, ever were left idle an instant. Scarcely had the party stepped into the inn which I was allowed to recommend, when they engaged me for the whole fortnight which they meant to devote to the survey of the Turkish capital.

My travellers were of the true inquisitive sort. Everybody used to fly at their approach, a circumstance highly favourable to my interest. Under the notion of always applying for information to the fountain-head, they would stop the surliest Turk they met, to ask why Moslemen locked up their women. One day they begged the imperial minister, at his own table, to tell them confidentially whether Austria was to be trusted. They were very solicitous to know from the Russian envoy the number of Catharine's lovers, and they pressed hard for an audience of the kishlar-aga,* only to inquire whence came the best black eunuchs. Had they been in company with the grand mufti, they certainly would have asked his honest opinion of the mission of Mohammed; and they would scarcely have neglected the opportunity, had it offered, of inquiring of the sultan himself whether he was legitimate heir to the califate, as he asserted. In consequence of this straight-forward system, I was every moment obliged to interfere, and to pledge myself for the guiltless intentions of our travellers. The statistics of the empire, its government, politics, finances, &c., indeed, they troubled themselves little about. All such things they thought they could learn much more compendiously at home from the Leipsic Gazetteer; but the botany and mineralogy of the country were what they studied both body and soul. Every day we brought home from our excursions such heaps of what the ignorant chose to call hay and stones, that the wags whom we met on our way used to ask us whether these were for food and lodging, while the more fanatical among the Turks swore we carried away patterns of the country in order to sell it to the infidels; and one party, by way of giving us enough of what we wanted, was near stoning us to death. Hereupon, to elude observation, my cunning travellers determined to dress after the country fashion; but this only made bad worse; for they wore their new garb so awkwardly, that the natives began to think they put it on in mockery, and were frequently near stripping them to the skin; independent of which, whenever they went out they got so entangled in their shaksheers* and trousers, their shawls, and their papooshes, that our progress might be traced by the mere relics of their habiliments which strewed the road. Sole manager both of the home and foreign department, I however tried to give all possible respectability to their appearance, and never would suffer their dignity to be committed by paltry savings; at the same time, to show them how careful I was of their money, I took care sometimes to detain them an hour or two in driving a close bargain about a few paras, especially when I saw them in a hurry. Accordingly, if they had any fault to find with me, it was for my over-scrupulous economy. That failing alone excepted, they thought me a treasure; and so I certainly found them.

The fortnight of their intended stay having elapsed, they were all impatience to depart. Out of pure regard for science, I contrived to prolong their sojourn another fortnight by various little delays, which, with a little industry, I brought about in the most natural way imaginable, but which I joined them in lamenting exceedingly; and when at last they set off, which I saw with very sincere regret, I was left by them in possession of a most flattering written testimonial of my zeal and fidelity. As to their behaviour to me, its liberality might be sufficiently inferred from the change in my appearance. I looked a different person.

This first experiment gave me a taste for the tergiumanistic life. It also increased my means of success in that line. Until I took up my residence at Pera, I had little intercourse with that odd race of people yclept Franks, except through the stray specimens that now and then crossed the harbour on a visit of curiosity or business to Constantinople. I now got acquainted with their ways, while they became familiarized with my person. This gradually procured me the advantage of seeing and serving in my new capacity samples of almost every nation of Europe. Thus I formed a sort of polyglot collection of certificates of my own ability and merits, which I filed very neatly according to the order of their dates, and to a sight of which I treated every new comer whom I thought worthy of that distinction.

Once, however, the lofty manner and the imperious tone of an English traveller, newly arrived, completely deceived me. From his fastidiousness, I made no doubt I was addressing some great mylordo. It was a button-maker to whom I had the honour of bowing. He came red-hot from a place called Birmingham, to show the Turks samples of his manufacture. Unfortunately, Turks wear no buttons, at least such as he dealt in; at which discovery he felt exceedingly wrath. My ill-fated back was destined to feel the first brunt of his ill-humour. After spending nearly two hours in spelling every word of every one of my certificates, "This, then," said he, in a scarce intelligible idiom which he fancied to be French, "is the evidence of your deserts?" "It is," answered I, with an inclination of the head. "And I am to make it the rule of my behaviour?" "If your excellency be pleased to have that goodness," replied I, smirking most agreeably. "Very well," resumed the traitor, never moving a muscle of his insipid countenance, "my excellency will have that goodness." And up he gets, gravely walks without uttering another syllable to the door, turns the key in the lock, takes a little bit of a pistol scarce five inches long (also from Birmingham, I suppose) out of his pocket, snatches up a cudgel as thick as my wrist, and turning short upon me, who stood wondering in what this strange prelude was to end, holds the pistol to my throat, and lays the cane across my back.

This operation performed to his satisfaction—"It was No. 5," coolly said the miscreant, "whose contents I thought it right to comply with, first; as being written by one of my countrymen, and because I make it a rule, in every species of business to get the worst part over first. Had you understood our language—as an interpreter by profession ought—you might have known the certificate in question to be a solemn adjuration to all the writer's countrymen, to treat you as I have had the pleasure of doing; and all that remains for you to perform, is, to give me a regular receipt, such as I may have to show."

The pistol was still tickling my throat—I jammed up against the wall, and the button-maker six feet high, and as strong as a horse. All, therefore, I could do, in the way of heroism, would have been, to have let him blow out my brains at once;—after which, adieu my turn, at least, here below! I therefore signed, had the satisfaction of seeing the receipt neatly folded up and deposited in a little red morocco pocket-book, with silver clasps; was offered a sequin for the exercise I had afforded; took the money, and leaving the button-maker to write home what mean rascals the Greeks were, departed, fully impressed with the usefulness of learning languages.

Almost every evening, the man of buttons used to walk from Pera, where he had his lodgings, to a merchant's at Galata, from whence he frequently returned home pretty late at night, without any escort; trusting to his small pocket instrument and to his own colossal stature for his safety. A dexterous thrust at an unexpected turn might easily have sent him to the shades below; but this would not have sufficed to assuage my thirst for just revenge. I wished to inflict a shame, more deep, more lasting than my own, and which, like Prometheus's vulture, should keep gnawing the traitor's heart while he lived. His great ambition at Constantinople was, to boast the good graces of some Turkish female—young or old, fair or ugly, no matter! On this laudable wish I founded my scheme.

Muffled up in the feridjee which entirely covers the figure of the Mohammedan fair, and the veil which conceals their faces, I went and seated myself, immediately after dusk, on one of the tombstones of the extensive cemetery of Galata, where my traveller had to pass.

He soon arrived; and, as I expected, stopped to survey the lonely fair one, whose appearance seemed to invite a comforter. The bait took. My friend, on his nearer approach, aware that his pantomime was more intelligible than his idiom, had recourse to the universal language: he held up a sequin—his regular fee on all occasions—and my acceptance of which encourages my shepherd to become more enterprising. He now wishes to unveil me.

I resist :—but by way of compromise for keeping concealed my features, I show my necklace, my bracelets, my girdle. In an infantine manner, I slip the manacles from my own wrists over those of my companion ; and, before his suspicions are aroused, have the satisfaction to see him fast bound in chains, not only of airy love, but of good solid brass ; and, with a soft lisp, wish him joy of being at once handcuffed and pinioned. It was now I showed my face, and drew out my handjar.* Seeing him disposed to remonstrate, “No noise,” cried I, “or you die ; but return me the receipt.” Unable to stir, my prisoner, in a surly tone, bade me take it myself. I did so, and thanked him ; “But,” added I, “as we have not here, as with you, all the conveniences for writing, accept the acknowledgment of the poor and illiterate :” saying which, I drew the holy mark of the cross, after the Greek form, neatly, but indelibly, with the button-maker’s own sequin, on his clumsy forehead ; poured into the wound some of the gunpowder out of his pouch ; and apologizing for the poorness of the entertainment, bade him good night, and walked off.

A troop of caleondjees of my acquaintance, reeling home from a tavern, happened to come up just as I retired, and took all that I had left. The next morning the man of buttons departed from Constantinople, without sound of trumpet, before sunrise ; and never since has been heard of in the Turkish dominions.

This little frolic at the expense of the English shopkeeper recommended me to a French chevalier, come to Stamboul on a visit to his kinsman, the ambassador. The lively young gentleman swore he wanted no other certificate of my character besides my prowess. His object in undertaking the long journey to Turkey seemed to be, to play on the guitar, and to compose French love-songs. Twice a week a messenger of the embassy was despatched to Paris with M. de Vial’s effusions, in order that his friends at home might see how he employed his time abroad. Par contre, he had determined, as soon as he returned to France, and found himself at leisure, to write a detailed account of Turkey—rather, however, as it ought to be, than as it was. For M. de Vial disapproved of the Othoman system in toto : and hence, he deemed it sheer loss of time to visit the curiosities of its capital. The only thing he could have liked—had he not been too busy learning the romeïka—was an affaire de cœur with the favourite sultana; and for a long while he continued exceedingly anxious to give the ladies of the imperial harem a fête on the Black Sea; but that project failing, from their sending no answers to his notes, he wondered who could bear the dowdies of Constantinople that had seen the Trois Sultanes of Marmon-tel at the Paris opera. In truth, M. de Vial had no patience with the barbarians. Their language was a gibberish, où l'on n'entendait rien; and they had so little savoir vivre, that they let their heads be chopped off like cabbage-tops. Desirous, however, of treating them to a sight of the last Paris fashions, he decked out his nether man in pea-green coloured cloth, and got himself chas-tised by a hot-headed emir,* for thus profaning the for-bidden colour—almost too sacred, with the Turks, for the head itself. In his turn, M. de Vial sent the cousin of Mo-hammed a challenge, with which the emir lighted his pipe. At last, after a whole day uselessly employed in ogling the sultana mother through a huge telescope from the tower of Galata, the chevalier felt seized with a desperate fit of ennui, laid in a reasonable stock of embroidered hand-kerchiefs, to throw to the Paris belles after a Turkish fashion, which the Turks know nothing of, and deter-mined to bid adieu to Pera. My services and talents he transferred, ere he went, to a flaxen-headed Swedish baron, whose ruddy face had inflamed the susceptible heart of the droguemaness of the Venetian mission, and who was so highly favoured by his doting mistress, that every night she allowed him to pay her whole loss at tresette. This lady was an uncommon proficient in writing. Proud of an accomplishment which so few of her colleagues possessed, she used every morning to fire at her lover a little billet-doux of three or four pages. These refresh-ing epistles I came to call for as regularly as for the water from the well, the moment the husband was supposed to have gone forth to the reis-effendee, with the scarce shorter memorials of the Serenissima Republica—at that period any thing but serene. This same husband, though only four feet high, presumed to be jealous; and the correspondence, therefore, was to be kept from his knowledge—a circumstance which rendered my office of Mercury an employment of some trust.

I acted accordingly. Tired of being postman without pay, I one day hinted to the lady that I should expect some species of acknowledgment for my trouble. Madame P——i was one of those fair ones for whom Cupid must tip his dart with gold, or they recoil unfelt. She resented my freedom, called me a low-born fellow, and forbade me her presence. The tide of amorous billets now ceased to flow for want of a channel. Nothing but my forgiveness of the insult could make it resume its course. On the part of the lady, accordingly, advances were soon made towards a reconciliation, and on mine every spark of resentment was magnanimously extinguished until further occasion. I saw myself reinstated formally in my daily office.

The hyperborean lover—not quite so brisk a correspondent as his mistress—used to answer about one letter in three or four. This, however, in the course of a few weeks, began to form a very respectable collection. The pink-edged perfumed epistles—regularly endorsed—were all deposited by the delighted droguemaness in a little mother-of-pearl casket, which she kept, for the benefit of her heirs, by the side of her reliquary. From one of those strange incidents which will happen in the course of things, this casket, though most carefully locked up, fell into my hands; but no similar incident could conjure the key out of the lady's pocket. She used to sleep with it under her pillow, in order to obtain pleasant dreams. It mattered little: I had no sort of curiosity to peruse the correspondence. I contented myself with carefully wrapping up the box, sealing the cover, and begging the signor drogueman—that is to say, the lady's husband—to keep the parcel in trust for me, as most valuable property, and such as could not be committed to fitter hands. The rod thus kept suspended over his faithless spouse, the reward of my discretion, past and future, was demanded of her with becoming humility; and, to do the lady justice, when she found that no other way of extricating herself was left, she showed every readiness to listen to the voice of reason.

By some accident, however, the baron got wind of these transactions; and so far from feeling flattered, as he ought to have been, with the anxiety which his mistress evinced to recover his letters, he had the ingratitude to cavil about the mode ; and left the fair one to find what consolation she could, in the reperusal of his correspondence. I speedily followed his example, and retired in my turn ; leaving the droguemaness punished alike in her pride and her avarice.

CHAPTER IX.

No sooner had my various little trades rendered me a person of some substance than I began to think of purchasing a berath :*—I mean one of those patents of exemption from the rigour of Turkish despotism which the sultan originally granted to foreign ministers, in behalf only of such rayahs as they had occasion to engage in their immediate service, but which these excellent economists now readily sell to whatever other subjects of the grand signor are disposed to pay the current price of the article. To a youth like me it was highly desirable to possess a paper through whose magic power a native might, in the very capital of his natural sovereign, outstep the limits of his jurisdiction, brave his authority, put himself on the footing of a stranger, and, from being heretofore an Armenian or a Greek, at once find himself transformed into a reputed Italian, or German, or Frenchman, wear the gaudiest colours in competition with the Turks themselves, and strut about the streets in that summun bonum, a pair of yellow papooshes.

The thing had been put into my head by an Italian missionary of the Propaganda, who, considering me as a sort of stray from the Greeks, had determined to stow me safely within the pale of the Romans. On first perceiving his drift, I gave his pious exertions small encouragement : observing, that early habits, as well of belief as of action, could only be rooted out later in life, either by the most irresistible arguments, or the most palpable interest to adopt different tenets. To this remark the missionary only replied that he had a very general acquaintance at Pera; and consequently, possessed many opportunities of recommending a well-disposed youth to travellers. The observation was in point. Impressed with its full weight, I began to indulge Padre Ambrogio, whenever I happened to be out of place, in a little conference on the disputed articles; and for every Greek variation from the Latin creed which I yielded up, he used to find me a new situation. Unfortunately, the discussion of the Greek liturgy ran so parallel with that of the Signora P—i's correspondence, and the interviews with the friar were so interwoven with those of the lady, that I sometimes confounded the two subjects, and more than once, in a fit of absence, let Padre Ambrogio into the mysteries of my negotiation, instead of learning from him those of his faith. The ghostly conferences, however, only ceased entirely when the friar very nefariously disappointed me, in favour of another neophyte, of an excellent employment, for which I had sacrificed the whole procession according to the Greeks. Hearing of this flagrant act of bad faith, I called upon him in a very great passion; told him I again disbelieved all that he had enticed me to believe; and leaving him exceedingly dismayed at my unexpected rebellion, went to dispel the confusion in my head by a walk on the road to Dolma-baektché.

The snow, which had lain several days on the ground, having entirely disappeared, I met several people taking the air; but who all looked, I thought, as if like me they had been bewildered by some friar or derwish. At last came a Turkish woman of rank, accompanied by a long train of females. The pavement being narrow, I stood up against the wall to let her pass. As she brushed by me, her hand gently pressing against the back of mine, gave me reason to think that I had not been unnoticed. A gay adventure seldom found me slow to engage in it, be what it might the peril of the enterprise. I therefore let the lively group trot on a few yards, and then turned back hastily myself, in the manner of a person who recollects having left something behind.

Thus, without casting right or left a single glance which might savour of design, I gave the lady an opportunity of minutely scrutinizing my appearance, should she be disposed to cultivate my merits. That done, I crossed over to the other side, and stole away into a by-lane, for fear of rousing the suspicions of her suite.

The next day, however, I failed not, at the same hour, to take a walk in the same street, and again did the same the next day, and the next; in the full expectation, each time, of meeting with some faithful Iris, commissioned to give me the verbal assurance of my good fortune.

During a whole week my punctuality continued without the least abatement. As sure as the clock struck one I used to sally forth, and display my handsomely attired person before every woman, young or old, fair or ugly, that bore the least appearance of coming on my business. Vain and fruitless diligence! The busier females passed on without noticing my disconsolate figure at all; the less diligent baggages, who remarked my airs and graces, only answered them with laughing. Some, who had become familiar with my forlorn perambulations, ironically pitied me for the cruelty of my mistress. It was worse when two or three goules that haunted the same street seriously undertook to console me under my disappointment, and put me in the greatest fright, lest, by their unconcealed advances in the broad glare of day, they should drive away any messenger of love that might be on the wing.

At last I lost all patience, and was going in good earnest to execute the resolution fifty times solemnly taken, and as often again broken, of giving up the vain pursuit; when just as for the last time I paced down the oft-trodden street, looking anxiously round on all sides, to see what good tidings might still be in the wind, I perceived a Jewess—seemingly equally on the alert with myself—who eyed me with a promising air. I coughed once or twice; and this signal inducing the old dame to approach, we opened a parly. My answers tallying with her private tokens, she soon became confidential.

“You must know,” said she, “I am a tradeswoman, one who goes about to ladies’ houses to provide them with”—

“What signifies, my dear,” cried I, interrupting her, “what you are, and what you provide your customers with? That speaks for itself. Only tell me who the lady is who graciously condescends to make me the object of your embassy.”

“The lady,” answered the Jewess, “is the young wife of an old Turkish effendee of very high rank. Her own birth and fortune made her parents stipulate that her spouse should have no other wife but herself. Nor has he; but while he adheres to the letter of the agreement, he violates its spirit.—In short, he totally neglects his handsome helpmate. This the fair Esmé properly resents—and—”

“And in me,” cried I, interrupting my informer, “she shall find the avenger she deserves. Let us forthwith go!”

“Gently, gently,” now whispered the old beldam. “It is not thus that matters of this sort are conducted. If the lady by whom I have the honour of being employed were one of your ordinary women, on whom the wind blows as freely as on the weeds of the desert, all would be easy enough. Females who go out at all hours to the bath, and to the market place, and to the bezesteen, or to visit their friends, do whatever they please. But Cadin Esmé is none of those, I’ll warrant you. This exalted fair one has in her own apartment baths of marble and gold; twenty slaves are always ready at her nod to execute whatever whim may cross her fancy; the richest goods of every country are all spread out before her at her toilet; her own chamber opens on gardens whose roses make those of Sheeraz look pale. In short—poor thing!—she can find nothing to want abroad, and when she does go out, it seems rather for the sole purpose of seeing how superior is all that she leaves at home. Then she generally only travels about in a close carriage. Her visits are confined to two or three of her near relations; and she so seldom finds an excuse for stirring out on foot, that the day you met her was the first time these six months she had stepped across her own threshold. Even when she indulges in a little excursion of the sort, she only moves, as you see, accompanied by a swarm of servants, or rather of spies.”

“You only add fuel to my flame,” cried I. “The more difficult the enterprise, the nobler the victory!”—and immediately we fell to discussing the ways and means. A hundred different schemes were alternately proposed and rejected. At last a contrivance was hit upon, only liable to half a dozen radical objections. Still it was the best, and therefore adopted. A friend of the Jewess’s, equipped as a woman of rank, was to spend the day on a visit to the Lady Esmé, whose husband could not, during that period, intrude upon the privacy of his wife’s apartment. Esmé would thus obtain an opportunity of slipping out in the attire of a slave, of stopping at the Jewess’s own abode to put on Greek habiliments, and of thence going to meet me at some selected house in Galata. After the interview, she would have nothing to do but to resume her Turkish dress, in order to release by her return her pretended visiter. The plan required some preparation, and the day after the next was fixed upon for its execution.

Matters thus being all apparently settled,—“One word more,” added the Jewess. “You are aware this an adventure of life and death. In this nether world the joys of Paradise can only be sipped with the secrecy of the grave. The least indiscretion brings ruin to us all.”

I begged my instructress to make herself easy on that score; “and,” added I in my turn, “there is one circumstance which the lady may not be sorry to learn; namely, that in me she will find a youth not only of the greatest discretion, but of the most respectable birth and connexions.”

I thought the peal of laughter never would have ended into which the old hag broke out at this intimation. “And pray,” cried she, “do you imagine the fair Esmé is in love with you for your musty ancestors, or means to show you off to her acquaintances? For my part, I mistook you for little better than a porter. If you be a prince, so much the worse! It will require consideration.” Here the beldam hobbled off.

“Can I have marred my hopes by my vanity?” thought I, after the woman was gone. But though this idea gave me a little uneasiness, it prevented me not from bestowing the utmost pains, on the day appointed, in adorning my person, ere I went to a place conveniently situated for watching the entrance of the party into the house agreed upon.

Here minute after minute rolled on without my perceiving the least symptom of the looked-for couple. But what I very clearly discerned instead were loud titterings behind a latticed window, which, presently, left no doubt in my mind that the whole interview was a mere waggery of some of the females who had found me out, and were determined to have a laugh at my expense. The very description of the lady’s grandeur now made that matter palpable by its exaggeration; and I held myself assured that the greatest real danger I had to apprehend was that of becoming the laughing-stock of the whole district. In this conviction, I cursed my credulity, and set my wits to work in order to devise how I might turn the joke against its authors, when a faint murmur made me look round, and behold two females, carefully muffled up, glide into the place of our appointment.

"Shall I follow, or not?" was now my only thought, "and take my chance of whatever good or evil may offer?"

The Jewess suffered not my suspense to last. Coming out again,—“What are you waiting for?” whispered she impatiently in my ear; and, without staying for my answer, took me by the hand and led me up stairs; where, having bidden me not to be frightened, she left me, and ran down again to keep watch while I remained.

By some strange perversity of human nature, the Jewess's seemingly superfluous caution had the contrary effect from that which was intended; and, combined with Esmé's apparent backwardness to throw off her feridjee, made me fancy I had been entrapped with a perfect monster. Full of this idea, I cursed the Israelite for leaving me thus committed; would have given the world to have seen her return, even with the account of some urgent real danger; and stood riveted near the door like a statue, until my expectant fair one, losing all patience, tore off her envelopes, advanced in anger rather than in love, and convinced me of my egregious error.

As her wrath did not continue inexorable, I hope I may pass over the remaining details of this interview, without any great violation of my duty as a biographer:—they presented strong features of resemblance with many others of the same description; and, in truth, though the rare beauties of my mistress—her soft black eyes, her coral lips, and her carriage, graceful as that of the swan gliding on the waters—might have obtained, at other times, a more elaborate encomium, thoughts of a sedater hue occupy my mind at the present moment.

Irksome as I had thought the departure of the Jewess, I thought her return still a thousand times more barbarous, when, ere we had time to think of her existence, she reappeared, and, with relentless cruelty, summoned us to separate.

It seemed as if we had only just met; and it also seemed as if we never were to meet again; for the expedient resorted to could not be repeated, and our faculties were too much bewildered to think of any other. Like people just awaking from a rapturous dream, or rather just shaking off a deep intoxication, we reeled about, lost in a maze of confused feelings, and able to reflect neither on the past, the present, or the future. The vain attempt to think was soon given up, and we settled, to communicate through the channel of the Israelite, when our minds should be sobered by separation. At the moment of parting, however, and when casting on each other the last farewell glance,—“What can I do,” cried the grateful Esmé, “to repay my saviour,* my sovereign, and my god; what gifts, worth his acceptance, can I bestow? Take this, and this, and this: it is nothing to what I owe you—it is all I can give in return;” and so saying, she tore off her richest jewels, and heaped upon me strings of pearls, clasps of rubies, and girdles of diamonds.

“And do you then imagine,” cried I, “that one honoured by your smiles can expect, or can want a recompense of this sort?”

“What signifies,” replied the fair one, “what you expect, or what you want!—you wanted not the poor recluse Esmé, when you vouchsafed to come to me. I have my burthen of gratitude to lessen. For my sake I must give, and for mine you must receive.”

Still I refused. But a cloud began to gather on the brow thus far serene: gleams of ominous lightning flashed from those eyes that before glowed only with unmixed tenderness. “I see it,” cried Esmé, “I see it! You love me not. You fear to take an earnest. You intend not to return to my arms!”—and upon this, she tore her jetty locks. The Jewess now stepped forward. “For God’s sake,” said she, “pocket all, as I do. It may cost us our lives thus to stand upon ceremony.” I therefore yielded, took the proffered gifts, for this magnanimous act received a last, rapturous glance, and tore myself away.

Scarce deigning to lower my looks to the earth; scarce feeling the ground that bore my feet; gliding along on invisible pinions, rather than walking, I proceeded at random, intoxicated with my good fortune. In my own mind, I soared, at that moment, above all the monarchs of the globe. Constantinople seemed too small to contain my exultation; and, oppressed within its walls by the excess of my happiness, I went forth at the gates, and poured out into the country the ebullitions of my joy, and the ferment of my spirits.

Three good hours of uninterrupted exercise were requisite to lay them; after which I went home through the street which had been the scene of my forlorn perambulations, on purpose to show its familiars the difference in my air!

Here, however, let me, for an instant, interrupt the thread of my subject, in order to observe, that, though my courtships have thus far occupied a great portion of my narrative, it is not the history of my loves, but that of my life, which I wish to write. Instead, therefore, of detailing the scheme through means of which was effected our next meeting, and the many others which followed, I shall only in general state, that each interview seemed to increase the fondness of my mistress. Every circumstance of my situation, which gradually unfolded itself to her knowledge, only gave me new attractions in her eyes. Above all, she delighted in that inferiority of my condition to her own, which enabled me to become indebted for ease, affluence, and whatever else appeared desirable, to her sole affection. Hers was the mighty bliss of giving me all I possessed—of making me all I was.

Out of compliment to her taste, I bestowed upon my person the utmost attention. The berath, which before I had coveted, I now failed not to purchase; and the gold which I accepted for the sake of peace I laid out in such a way as to make the liberalities of the donor, at least, yield her eyes a fair return in my improved appearance. Now and then, indeed, too plentiful supplies proved hostile to my prudence; but if an opulence to which I had not been accustomed often got me into scrapes it always got me out again; nor left me, like modern friends, in the difficulties into which it had lured me. In one of my midnight orgies—for instance—being summoned by the patrol before the waywode, “I was on my way to him,” I forthwith exclaimed, “in order to discharge an old debt. Pray, gentlemen, have the goodness to take charge of these few sequins: but only pay them at your own convenience; and immediately, my freedom was restored to me with a hundred bows and scrapes. In another frolicksome mood, making so great a noise on the canal that the bostandgee-bashee had me handcuffed in spite of my berath—on the plea that it was too dark to read it—“I have heard,” I cried, “that a fine carbuncle will throw out as much light as a lamp. Vouchsafe, mighty sir, to try the experiment with this ring”—and, all at once, the officer saw so clearly I was a berathlee, as to grant me the entire range of the Bosphorus.

These occasional frolics were necessary, to keep up my spirits under the depression they began to experience. For my intrigue cast upon my free-agency a constraint which I had never felt before. I, who until that period knew not what it was to abstain or to conceal—who, even with the haughtiest of the archondessas of the Fanar, used to assert my liberty, and to mock the fair one's rage, now felt anxious, with the prisoner of the harem, to dissemble the least act of inconstancy of which I might happen to be guilty. Nor should it be supposed that this proceeded from any fear of stopping the current of the lady's bounty. It is true that, where I gave my love, and would have given my utmost largess had the means been mine, I scrupled not, with the affections, to receive the gifts of my wealthy mistress: but I was not so venal as to have sold for gold and jewels my person, independent of my heart; and Esmé owed to her situation alone a consideration which never yet had accompanied my preferences. The archon's wife, a free agent like myself, like me had been mistress of her choice, and where I sinned against her, had possessed all the means to retaliate. It was not so with Esmé. She was a helpless captive, who could not punish my offences by following my example. What with the one seemed a justifiable proceeding, with the other became wanton cruelty.

And most acutely would the fair Mohammedan have felt any unnecessary wound inflicted by my hand; most alive was her susceptible mind to all the fellest pangs of jealousy. "When first I loved you," she said, "you had never beheld me, you knew not whether I was fair or hideous, you could not harbour the least spark of reciprocal affection; you might, without the smallest sacrifice on your part, for ever have kept out of my sight, and left my hopeless flame, unfed, to die away. This, indeed—had not your heart been free, and able to return all the warmth of my feelings—honour, justice, and humanity required. You acted otherwise; ere yet you felt a spark of reciprocal tenderness, you threw yourself purposely in my way; you sedulously nourished my passion, and you have carried my madness to that pitch, where it must find yours commensurate, or end in my perdition. You now are bound to sustain the affection which you have gratuitously raised: you are pledged to save me from despair. If, after having fanned my love into a resistless blaze, you should think of forsaking me, I die;—but the same blow by which I fall, shall kill us both."

The same blow did not kill both! For when long impunity had made me so daring as to invade the effendee's own roof; when suspicions arose in the husband's mind, which he resolved to verify; when on he rushed to his harem; when right and left flew the women's slippers, placed as a spell at its threshold; when open burst the door of the sanctuary, and jealousy carried its search into the inmost recesses of the gynecæum; when what became of the hapless Esmé, heaven, the effendee, and the Black Sea alone can tell—not a hair of my head received the smallest injury. That very impetuosity of my enemy which seemed to doom me to certain and immediate destruction proved the means of my preservation. In the very act of making my escape, the door which turned back upon its hinges turned back upon my person, and concealed the intruder behind its friendly screen until the effendee and his troop had passed by. I then slipped away unperceived by any creature within. Some slaves, however, who kept watch on the outside, seeing me run, and in evident confusion, set up a hue and cry. Finding they gave me chase, I darted into a mosque, whose open gate seemed to invite my entrance. All I wanted was to throw my pursuers off the scent. A few old Moslemen were in the djamee,* mumbling their evening prayers; and while the mob outside howled after the adulterer, the congregation within began to scream at the yaor. Thus placed between two fires, all hopes of escape forsook me. I felt as if I must—but for some special miracle—soon be torn to pieces!

One human measure only remained to save my life. I drew my dagger, threw my cloak over my face, leaned my back against the mihrab,† and cried, "I am a Moslemin!"

If there existed not even any direct evidence of guilt having found its way at all into the effendee's harem, still less did there exist any such of my being the offender. All proof against me was merely circumstantial. So far from being found in the wife's faithless arms, I had not even been caught under the injured husband's roof. At most I had shown some signs of hurry near the disturbed dwelling; but though this might be reason enough to massacre an infidel, a follower of the true faith, however recent his conversion, demanded somewhat greater respect.

From the moment, therefore, in which I invoked the name of the prophet, every breath of accusation was hushed, every hand became suspended. A magic power seemed to arrest the daggers on my very breast. A fanatical mob instantly took under its protection the new proselyte.

But this proselyte I had bound myself to be. I had proclaimed myself one of the faithful; and on the spot, and in the very mosque, I went through the various forms which mark the reclaimed infidel, and announce his admission into the bosom of Islamism.

CHAPTER X.

HISTORIANS often err in attributing to a single great cause the effect of many minute circumstances combined. My sagacious biographer, for instance, would not fail to place my abjuration of the Christian faith entirely and solely to the account of my intrigue with a Turkish fair one, and the desperate alternative between life and death which ensued. Nothing would be more erroneous. The seemingly bold measure had long been preparing in petto; and the unexpected dilemma to which I was reduced may only be said to have fixed the period for its execution.

There had arrived at Pera a foreigner whom I shall call Eugenius. His ostensible object was to acquire the ancient lore of the East, in return for which he most liberally dealt out the new creed of the West. I cannot better describe him than as the antipodes to Father Ambrogio. For as the one was the missionary of a society for the propagation of belief; so was the other an emissary of a sect for the diffusion of disbelief. He meditated indeed a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, but with the view to prove more scientifically the fatuity of all things holy. Reason, philosophy, and universal toleration were the only objects of his reverence; and some of his tenets which I picked up by the way had in them a something plausible to my mind, and if not true, seemed to my inexperience ben trovati. He conceived that there might exist offences between man and man, such as adultery, murder, &c., more heinous than the imperfect performance of certain devout practices—eating pork steaks in Lent included; and above all, he thought that, whatever number of crimes a man, using his utmost diligence, might crowd in the short span of this life, they still might possibly be atoned for in the next by only five hundred thousand million of centuries (he would not abate a single second) of the most excruciating torture; though this period was absolutely nothing compared with eternity. As to his other tenets, they were too heinous to mention.

Ere Father Ambrogio was aware that Eugenius broached such abominable doctrines, he had introduced me to him in the quality of drogueman, or rather of cicerone: and the tone in which I was received might have made the father suspect that all was not right. But the father's range of intellectual vision extended not farther than his own nose, and that nose was a snub one.*

"It was you, quibbling, sophistical Greeks," cried Eugenius, laughing, "who, proud, at the commencement of the Christian era, of your recently imported gnosticism, perverted by its mystic doctrine the simple tenets of Christianity. It is you who, ever preferring the improbable and the marvellous to the natural and the probable, have contended for taking in a literal, and therefore in an absurd sense, a thousand expressions which, in the phraseology of the East, were only meant as figurative and symbolical; and it is you who have set the baneful example of admitting in religious matters the most extraordinary deviations from the course of nature and from human experience, on such partial and questionable evidence as, in the ordinary affairs of man, and in a modern court of justice, would not be received on the most common and probable occurrence."

Father Ambrogio, who had conceived that every reflection upon the Greeks must be in favour of the Romans, was delighted with this speech; and as he went away, earnestly recommended to me to treasure up in my memory all the sagacious sayings of the wise man whom I had the happiness to serve.

But it was not long before he changed his mind. The very next day, when I called on Eugenius, I found Padre Ambrogio in the most angry discussion with him about the doctrine of divine clemency, which the friar could not abide. Eugenius at last was obliged to say, in his laughing way, that since the father appeared so incurably anxious for endless punishment, all he could do for him was to pray that, by a single exception in his favour, he at least might be damned to all eternity. Father Ambrogio, who never laughed, and who hated Eugenius the more for always laughing, upon this speech left the room: but the next time he met me alone, he very seriously cautioned me against one who, he was sure, must be a devil incarnate.

"If so," thought I, "he preaches against his own trade; and his principal is little obliged to him for making his dominion a mere leasehold instead of a perpetuity." Meanwhile I resolved not to be too sure, and when Eugenius took off his clothes, watched whether I could perceive the cloven foot. Nothing appearing at all like it, and his disposition seeming gentle, obliging, and humane, I began to be fond of his company—until, from liking the man, I unfortunately by degrees came not to dislike some parts of the doctrine of which he was the apostle.

Eugenius differed in one respect from his brethren of the new school. While they wished to subvert all former systems in toto, ere they began to re-edify according to their new plan; he, on the contrary, only contended for the appeal to reason on points of internal faith, and urged, in external practices, the propriety of conforming to the established worship: and this, not from selfish, but philanthropic motives; "for," said he, "while the vulgar retain a peculiar belief, they will close their eyes and hearts against whatever practical good those wish to do them who join not in their creed; and should they, in imitation of their betters, give up some of their idle tenets—unable immediately, like those they imitate, to replace the checks of superstition by the powers of reason, they will only from bad lapse into worse, let loose the reins to their passions, and exchange errors for crimes."

Now, in conformity to this doctrine of my masters, what could be clearer than that it behooved me, where the Koran was become the supreme law—as a quiet, orderly citizen, zealous in support of the establishment—with all possible speed to become a Mohammedan. Should there happen to be any personal advantage connected with this public duty,—should my conforming to it open the door to places and preferments, from which I otherwise must remain shut out,—should it raise me from the rank of the vanquished to that of the victors, and enable me, instead of being treated with contempt by the Turkish beggar, to elbow the Greek prince, was that my fault? or could it be a motive to abstain from what was right, that it was also profitable?

The arguments appeared to me so conclusive, that I had only been watching for an opportunity to throw off the contemptuous appellation of Nazarene, and to become associated to the great aristocracy of Islamism, some time before the fair Esmé lent the peculiar grace of her accent to the Allah Illah Allah of the Mohammedans; and though for the credit of my sincerity, I could wish my conversion not exactly to have taken place at the particular moment at which the light of truth happened to shine upon me, yet, all things considered, I thought it wiser not to quibble about punctilios, than to be sewed in a sack, and served up for breakfast to some Turkish shark.

Thus it was that the doctrine of pure reason ended in making me a Mohammedan: but with a pang I quitted for the strange sound of Selim, my old and beloved name of Anastasius, given me by my father; and so often and so sweetly repeated by my Helena.

I was scarce a Mohammedan skin deep when I again met Padre Ambrogio, whom since my affair with Esmé I had entirely lost sight of, and who knew not my apostacy.

"Son," said he, in a placid tone, "we are all at times prone to passion; I myself, meek as you now see me, have had my unguarded moments: but it is impossible that you should not wish to achieve the glorious work so well begun. Suppose, therefore, we resume our spiritual exercises. You are already so far advanced in the right road, that we cannot fail ultimately to make you an exemplary Roman Catholic."

"Father," answered I, "what may ultimately happen it is not in man to foresee: meantime, since we met last, another trifling impediment has arisen to my embracing the Latin creed. I am become a Moslemin."

At this unlooked-for obstacle Father Ambrogio started back full three yards. "Holy Virgin!" exclaimed he, "how could you make such a mistake?"

Not caring to assign the true cause,—"I wanted," said I, "to secure in the next world a little harem of black-eyed girls."

At this speech Father Ambrogio fetched a deep sigh; and began to muse, looking alternately at his habit and at mine.—“Well!” said he, after a pause; “at least you no longer are a Greek, and that is something;” and hereupon he departed;—wondering, I suppose, where, in his paradise, Mohammed meant to dispose of the angels whose eyes were blue.

I never was very ambitious of learning, but my new godfather, a formal Turkish graybeard, could not brook my total ignorance of my new religion. “You are not here among Scheyis,”* said he, “who under the name of Mohammedans live the lives of yaoors, drink wine as freely as we swallow opium, and make as little scruple of having in their possession paintings of pretty faces,† as if at the day of judgment they were not to find souls for all those bodies of their own creating. You are—Allah be praised!—among strict and orthodox Sunnees; and, however an old believer may have had time to forget his creed, a young neophyte should have it at his fingers’ ends.”

So I had to learn my catechism afresh. Great was my inclination to expostulate;—but all I could obtain was to be provided with a teacher, who, for my twenty paras a lesson, should put me in the way of passing over the bridge Seerath‡ as speedily as possible. And this I was promised.

Nothing, therefore, could exceed my surprise, when in walked the gravest of the whole grave body of doctors of law—the very pink and quintessence of true believers; one who would not miss saying his naymaz regularly four times a day, three hundred and sixty days in the year,§ for all the treasures of the devas,|| who, to obtain the epithet of hafceez,¶ had learned his whole Koran by heart unto the last stop; and who, not satisfied with praying to God like other people, had linked himself to a set of dancing derwishes, for the sole purpose of addressing the Deity with more effect in a sugar-loaf cap, and twisting round the room like a top:—a personage who, in a devout fit, would plump down upon his knees in the midst of the most crowded street, without turning his head round before he had finished the last reekath* of his orison, if all Constantinople were trembling in an earthquake; who, considering all amusements as equally heinous, made no difference between a game of chess or mangala, and illicit attention to one's own great-grandmother, and once, in his devout fury, with his enormous chaplet positively demolished Karagheuz† in the midst of all his drollery: a personage who, at the end of the Ramadan,‡ looked like a walking spectre, and the very last time of this fast absolutely doubled its length, only for having snuffed up with pleasure, before the hours of abstinence were over, the fumes of a kiebab on its passage out of a cook-shop: a personage who had an absolute horror of all representations of the human figure—those of Saint Mark on the Venetian sequin only excepted: a personage, in fine, who already was surnamed in his own district the Wely or Saint; and whom all his neighbours were dying to see dead, only that they might hang their rags round his grave, and so get cured of the ague.

* Scheyis—the two principal sects among the Mohammedans are the Sunnees and the Scheyis; and as the difference between them is small, so is the hatred proportionably intense. The Turks are all Sunnees, the Persians all Scheyis—the former are more fanatical, and the latter more superstitious.

When this reverend moollah§ first made his appearance, his face was still bedewed with tears of sympathy, occasioned by a most heart-rending scene of domestic wo, which his charitable hand had just assuaged. In an adjoining street he had found, stretched out on a bare pavement, a whole miserable family—father, mother, brother, sister, together at least with a dozen children of tender age—in a state of complete starvation. The very description of such a piteous sight harrowed up my soul. Lest, however, the holy man should incur a suspicion of having been betrayed into a weakness so reprehensible as that of pity for the human species—for which he felt all the contempt it deserved, and which he never presumed to solace under any of the visitations inflicted by † Karagheuz—black eyes; the principal personage in a Turkish puppet-show resembling the Ombres Chinoises.

‡ Ramadan—or Ramazan; the month during which the Mohammedans fast all day and feast all night. While the sun remains above the horizon they dare not even refresh themselves with a drop of water or a whiff of tobacco.

§ Moollah—generic name for the doctors of law, who, according to the Mohammedan system, are doctors of divinity; in as far as the Mohammedan law is entirely founded on the Koran.

Providence—I should add, that the wretched objects of his present compassion were of that less criminal sort, the canine species! They belonged to those troops of un-owned dogs whom the Turks of Constantinople allow to live in their streets on the public bounty, in order to have the pleasure of seeing them bark at the Christians whom their Frank dress betrays. To these and other beings of the irrational genus were entirely confined the benefactions of my tutor; and if his own species have few obligations to acknowledge from him, he was recorded as having purchased the liberty of three hundred and fifty canary birds in cages, granted pensions to the baker and butcher for the maintenance of fifty cats, and left at least a dozen dogs, whom he found on the pavé, handsomely provided for in his will.

No sooner was my venerable instructor comfortably seated on his heels in the angle of my sofa, than looking around him with an air of complacency, as if he liked my lodgings, he told me, to my infinite satisfaction, that provided he only took his station there for two hours every day, he pledged himself before the end of the first year to instruct me thoroughly in all the diversities of the four orthodox rituals—the Hanefy, Schafey, Hanbaly, and Maleky; together with all that belonged to the ninety-nine epithets of the Deity, represented by the ninety-nine beads of the chaplet. In the space of another twelve-month he ventured to hope that he might go over with me the principal difference between the two hundred and eighty most canonical mufessirs or commentators on the Koran, as well as the two hundred and thirty-five articles of the creed, on which theologians entertain a difference of opinion; and in the third year of our course, he promised to enable me completely to refute all the objections which the Alewys and other dissenters make to the Sunnee creed; and to have a general idea of the tenets of the seventy-two leading heretical sects, from that of Ata-lake-n-el-Mookanna, or the one-eyed prophet with the golden mask, to Khand-Hassan, the fanatic who ate pork and drank wine in the public market-place like any Christian: so as through dint of so much diligence on the fourth and last year to have nothing to do but to go over the whole again, and imprint it indelibly on my memory. By way of a little foretaste of his method of disputation, he took up one of the controverted points; first raised his own objections against it; and then—as he had an indubitable right to do with his undisputed property—again completely overset them by the irresistible force of his arguments; after which, having entirely silenced his adversary, he rose equally proud of the acuteness of his own rhetoric, and charmed with the sagacity with which I had listened.

The truth is, I had fallen asleep; wherefore, when I suddenly awoke on the din of his argumentation ceasing, I shook my head with a profound air, and by way of showing how much in earnest I meant to be, with a very wise look, said I could not give my unqualified assent, until I heard both sides of the question. Thus far I had heard neither.

This determination rather surprised my doctor, who seemed to have relied on my faculty of implicit credence. "Hear both sides of the question!" exclaimed he, in utter astonishment. "Why that is just the way never to come to a conclusion, and to remain in suspense all the days of one's life! Wise men first adopt an opinion, and then learn to defend it. For my part, I make it a rule never to hear but one side; and so do all who wish to settle their belief."

The thing had never occurred to me before; but I thought it had in it a something plausible, which at any rate made me resolve not to lengthen the four years' course by idle doubts. Accordingly, in the first three lessons I agreed to every thing the doctor said or meant to say, even before he opened his mouth, and only wondered how things so simple, for instance, as the prophet's ascent to the third heaven on the horse Borak, with a peacock's tail and a woman's face (I mean the horse), could be called in question. Unfortunately, when in the fourth lesson the moollah asserted that Islamism was destined ultimately to pervade the whole globe, a preposterous longing seized me to show my learning. I asked how that could be, when, as Eugenius had asserted, an uninterrupted day of several months put the fast of the Ramadan wholly out of the question near the poles? This difficulty, which the doctor could not solve, of course put him into a great rage. He reddened, rubbed his forehead, repeated my query, and at last told me, in a violent perspiration, that if I mixed travellers' tales with theology, he must give up my instruction.

I was too happy to take him at his word; instantly paid what I owed for the lessons received, and begged, henceforth to remain in contented ignorance. Lest, however, I should appear petulant to my godfather, I went and desired him to find me a moollah that was reasonable.

"A moollah that is reasonable!" exclaimed an old gentleman present, who happened to belong to the order himself. "Why, young man, that is a most unreasonable request. The Koran itself declares the ink of the learned to be equal in value to the blood of martyrs; and where will a single drop be shed in disputation, if all agree to be reasonable? But come," added he, laughing, "I will undertake, without a fee, to teach you in one word all that is necessary to appear a thorough-bred Moslem; and if you doubt my receipt, you may even get a fethwa of the musty, if you please, to confirm its efficacy. Whenever you meet with an infidel, abuse him with all your might, and no one will doubt you are yourself a staunch believer." I promised to follow the advice.

CHAPTER XI.

STERN winter had breathed his last: his churlish progeny had fled. The waves were no longer lashed by storms, nor was the earth fettered by frost. Constantinople hailed the day, revered alike by Greeks and Turks, when St. George opens in state the gaudy portals of the spring. The north wind had ceased to howl through Stamboul's thin habitations. Mild zephyr reigned alone; and as his fragrant breath went forth in gentle sighs, the white winding-sheet of snow retired gradually from the mountain's rugged brow, while a verdant carpet of tender herbage spread along the hollow valley. The taller trees of the forest might still slumber awhile: the less shrubs and plants of the garden were all waking, to resume their summer robes of rich and varied dye. Blushing blossoms crowned their heads, and every transient gale was loaded with their fragrance. Over fields enamelled with the crimson anemone fluttered millions of azure butterflies, just broke forth from their shells with the flowers on which they fed, and hardly yet able to unfurl their wings in air: while on every bough was heard some feathered songster, hailing the new season of joy and of love. The very steeds of the imperial stables, liberated that day from their dark winter stalls, measured with mad delight Kiadhané's verdant meads, while their joyful neighing re-echoed from the hills around. Under each dazzling portico reflected in the Bosphorus were seen groups of ich-oglans and pages, sporting their new spring suits, like gilded beetles, in the sun. All eyes seemed riveted on the Othoman fleet, which, in gay and gallant trim, majestically issued forth from the deep mouth of the harbour, and with every snowy sail swelling in the breeze, advanced towards Marmora's wider basin, there to commence its yearly cruise through the mazy Archipelago. Of the immense population of Constantinople, a part was skimming, in barges glittering like goldfish, the scarce ruffled surface of the channel, while the remainder sauntered in gay parties on the fringed terraces that overhang its mirror, and in the woody vales that branch out from its banks. On all sides resounded the tuneful lyre and the noisy cimbál, animating the steps of the joyous dancers. Nature and art, the human race, and the brute creation seemed alike to enjoy, in every form of diversified festivity, the epoch when recommence the hopes, the labours, and the delights of summer.

I too was one of the mirthful throng. In company with a few Osmanlees, not the most rigid of their race, I had been indulging in the orgies of the day outside the gate of Selivria. Somewhat flushed with the juice of the berry which Bacchus first planted in my country, we were returning towards the Top Capoose,* when close beside us came prancing an exceeding bad horseman mounted on a worse steed. At Constantinople it often occurs, that an old menial, whose rambles never extended beyond the village of St. Stephens, and whose foot never pressed a stirrup, is rewarded for his domestic services, by a military fief or zecameth,† at ten or twenty days' journey from the capital. He then first learns to ride in the plains outside the gate of Adrianople, in order that he may know how to cling to his saddle, when constrained to present himself before his vassals. Of this description seemed to be the equestrian whose pleasure it was to annoy us. Proud of his newly-acquired horsemanship, he was incessantly in our way, now trotting, now prancing, now galloping at full speed, so as to keep us involved in a constant cloud of dust, with the additional advantage of expecting every instant a nearer participation in his horse's kicks and curvetings. Whether, in order to avoid his company, we went slow or fast, or turned to the right-hand or to the left, still he haunted us like our shadow; or if for a moment he seemed to have taken his leave, it was only to raise a fallacious hope, and return to the charge with renewed powers of annoyance, when least expected; like the forest fly that haunts the weary traveller, and seems to enjoy the restless state in which he keeps his helpless adversary. Vexatious as was the fellow's behaviour, my either less irritable or more sober companions agreed not to notice it. They would have nothing to do, they said, with a saucy green-head, only amenable before his own officers, and sure to be supported, whatever outrage he might commit, by all his comrades. Less patient, or less awed by the prophet's kindred, I swore I would grapple with the emir, and soil the green of his turban with the red of its brainless tenant: when, guessing my intentions, he buried his sharp stirrups* in his lank and harassed steed, and scampered away; but not before he had succeeded in what seemed throughout to be the end of all his labour; namely, in bespattering me from head to foot with all the mud of almost the only puddle which remained in the road.

Who that, in the full pride of an entire new suit, of which the colour has long been pondered over, the stuff chosen after infinite consideration, the making only intrusted to the most skilful artists, the fitting tried in all its various stages, the final arrival obtained only at the very period destined for its display, and the inimitable beauty exhibited yet to a small portion only of those intended to be dazzled with its splendour—is fated to see the work of so much thought and labour irretrievably spoiled in all its precious bloom, and from an object of exultation rendered a subject of mockery; who, I say, that is fated to undergo such a trial, ever preserved his temper unruffled, and was blessed with feelings sufficiently torpid to abstain from falling out even with blind and undesigning chance?

Then fancy my impatient spirit submitted to this trial, and that by the unprovoked malice of a fellow-mortal! But a few moments before, alas! the vest of purple broadcloth, the velvet jacket of emerald green, the scarlet bernoos* lined with sky-blue satin, and the ample trousers of a blushing lilac, like the tints that surround the setting sun blended together in a universal galaxy, through dint of the embossed gold, that covered all its prominent parts as with a network, still shone in the full perfection of their primitive purity. My dress resembled the infant leaves of the spring, yet untainted either by blight or insect. After parading its beauties all day like a peacock in the country, I was only going home to display them all the evening, as on a new stage, in the illuminated coffee-houses† in the town, when, not even by the unavoidable decrees of an inexorable destiny, but by the insolence of a paltry serving man, all my honours fell blasted in the bud, and every item of my gay attire was made to display the marks of a shower of black offensive mud; so that I looked like a once gaudy tulip, whose erect splendour has been crushed by some restive ass's heedless hoof. Such was my indignation at the insult, and still more at the escape of the culprit, that I felt a positive want of some luckless wight on whom to vent my rage.

At that inauspicious moment, who should suddenly start up, as from the very bowels of the yawning earth, but my friend Anagnosti, whom I had left buried in the Bagnio!

On quitting that prison, I was fully determined not to let an hour elapse without applying for his liberation, nor to rest until I had procured it. For that purpose chiefly I had gone to Mavroyeni. The reader may remember how I was received. The fainting fit which followed, the illness in the hospital, and the indigence I had to encounter on first being thrown anew upon the wide world, had combined to prevent for several weeks all furtherance of my design. When my condition improved, I thought it advisable to wait till I had earned a character, had acquired friends among the Franks, and had purchased the berath which might give greater independence to my movements in behalf of a rayah. These came in due time, but with them also unfortunately came the infatuation of my Turkish amour, during which I was obliged, for my mistress's sake, carefully to avoid attracting the public attention; and this affair only ended in that apostacy which made me, bold as I was, dread the reproachful sight of Anagnosti. Yet I had not abandoned my purpose; and I had determined, the very day after St. George, to labour to effect my friend's release, when he thus unexpectedly crossed my way.

The very presence of Anagnosti—and of Anagnosti after my long neglect of his forlorn situation, freed from his fetters without my assistance—was in itself a severe rebuke. The negligence of which I stood convicted by my friend's deliverance almost made me regret the circumstance as premature. I felt his freedom as a boon he should not have accepted, except at my hands; as an event expressly brought about to shame me. Though in reality he came from celebrating—probably in a somewhat different manner—the same festival* with myself, he seemed only to rush thus full upon me while yet ignorant of his liberty, and unprepared for his appearance, in order to take me by surprise, and to enjoy my confusion.

This idea alone was sufficiently galling; but had no suspicion of the sort entered my mind, had I felt entitled to regard myself as the sole self-applauding author of my friend's release, as the guardian angel to whom belonged his fullest gratitude, still could I most devoutly have wished that fate had brought me in contact with his thorough Greek figure at any other time rather than at the present moment. Thrown among Osmanlees proud of their untainted blood, and whose consideration I courted, I had but just asserted an equality with my lofty companions, by swearing indeed that I was not one of those Candioté Turks† who, though three parts Greek, are yet regarded as among the highest mettled of the sultan's Mohammedan subjects, but by swearing this in so significant a manner as to be disbelieved, to gain credit for the reverse of what I affirmed, and to combine the benefit of a lie with the right to boast strict veracity: I had even, in conformity with the moollah's advice, most vehemently abused the whole race of Christian dogs; and in the midst of my success and my exultation, to find myself thus suddenly confronted with the only person who, by his familiar address, must not only overturn the whole fabric of my raising, but proclaim me a mere renegado—an outcast from the very Bagnio, threatened so total a subversion of all my views and hopes, as to give Anagnosti, in my already ruffled mind, the character of an enemy rather than of a friend. The instant I perceived him I felt my cheek burn with shame and vexation, and tried to avoid his irksome notice; but already I had caught his watchful eye.

In this situation I felt that a mere retreating movement would only invite a more eager and marked advance, and conceived that nothing but a coolness so obvious as to wound my friend to the quick, and make him in his disappointment be the first to shun all recognition, could save me from his dreaded familiarity. Upon this principle, instead of either darting forward to meet his embrace, or shrinking from his approach, I stopped suddenly short, stood entirely motionless, and with all the dignity of the turban, just put out my hand, to receive the homage of his respectful lip.

His first glance alighting only on my features, had made him rush forward to press me to his bosom. His second look, falling upon my dress and companions, again arrested his progress, and seemed to rivet his feet to the ground. Hence, judging him sufficiently awed by my mere appearance, I now ventured to utter some condescending expressions: but my words he heeded not. Keeping his haggard eyes fixed on my person, he asked me whether a spell fascinated his senses, or whether in reality I was become—a Moslemin, he would have said; but the hateful appellation stuck in his throat. Not caring he should give it utterance—"Be what I may," I hastily cried, "proceed thou, without fear."

The pious ceremonies of the morning—not I trust the devout libations of the afternoon—had imparted to my friend's religious enthusiasm a more than usual warmth. At this mortifying speech, resentment of my neglect, indignation at my apostacy, wounded pride, and disappointed affection took possession of his soul.

"Fear!" exclaimed he, repeating my last words with an hysteric laugh; while his eye darted lightning, and his lip curled up in scorn: "Fear suits only the deserter of his country and his God!"

So proud a taunt completed the rising ferment of my blood. Enraged at the invective, still more enraged at its coming from a rayah, from a man of mean appearance, and in the presence of sneering Osmanlees, I mechanically thrust my hand in my girdle and drew out my handjar. It was an unmeaning and half-involuntary action: I had no fatal purpose; I intended not—no, upon the solemn word of one again prostrate before the Cross—I intended not to hurt a hair of my friend's sacred head. Frantic, he rushed forward, and fell—fell upon the weapon's too diligently sharpened point. He then struck me away from him, while the dagger—slipping through my palsied fingers—remained, as he intended, deep buried in his side.

Leisurely he drew it out, and with a sort of complacency viewing his blood as it trickled from the blade—"O my mother, my mother," he exclaimed, "thy dying words then prove true. My friends alone have been my perdition, and the small crimson speck found on the bands of our brotherhood, is grown into the stream that now gushes from my heart! But at least Anastasius," added he, with a look which pierced my very soul, "I have prevented him who made a vow to defend me to his last dying breath, from being the destroyer of my wretched life. I wondered thou hadst abandoned thy friend. Alas! I knew not that thou hadst forsaken thy God! May he pardon thee as I do! Life to me was bitterness, death is a welcome guest! I rejoin those who love me; and already, methinks, they stretch out their arms from heaven to their dying Anagnosti. Thou—if there be in thy breast one spark of pity left for him thou once namedst thy brother, ah, suffer not the starving hounds in the street—See a little hallowed earth thrown over my wretched corpse."

These words were his last. He staggered; his body fell lifeless across the highway, and his spotless soul flew to heaven.

In the day of battle, so mighty are the preparations for hurling death at thousands; by so many are the shafts of the grim destroyer seen, expected, launched, and felt; so rapidly are the slain often followed by their slayers and the mourned by their mourners, that the harvest of the grave, however dire and sudden, scarce finds leisure to be noticed, and no longer appals an imagination already stunned and dizzy with excitement. But when in the hour of mirth and thoughtlessness a single living frame of exquisite perfection is, by some unforeseen blow, suddenly snatched away in the full exercise of all its energies corporeal and mental, and changed into an insensible mass of clay, stretched out in the kindred dust, unconscious of the greatest insults, how drear, how awful to the beholder seems the vast and sudden change! Fixed in intent amazement at the dismal one which I had witnessed—witnessed, but not occasioned!—I long continued gazing on my friend's lifeless form, and at last—late at night—returned into the city, by the same gate through which, in the morning, I had gone forth full of mirth.

But sad was now my soul! I felt the heavy hand of the Almighty upon me! I felt the long series of chastisements beginning which awaited my apostacy. Precisely where the religion of my fathers had imposed upon me the most sacred ties, where by my change I had most grievously sinned against it, and where the punishment of my infidelity must wound my heart most painfully, there the first blow had been struck! It was because I had abandoned my God that I had been doomed to lose my friend—the friend to whom I had been sworn in his holy name!—and doomed to lose him by my own thrice-cursed hand! And so great became, from the bitter taste of its first fruits, the sense of my guilt, that, could I only have avoided the dismal fate of an utter outcast, bidden for ever to fly his country and to roam among strangers, I would willingly have forfeited all else which I possessed or could hope for, even now to abjure my new errors, and to return to my old condition and worship. Nor did any fear of its consequences mix itself with the feelings which my misfortune called forth in me. Had I even been most unquestionably guilty of the premeditated murder of an infidel, my life, as a Moslem, could run no risk from the award of the Turkish law. But the numerous circle which had witnessed the scene united in asserting my entire innocence; and when on the morning after the deed I presented myself of my own accord at the nearest mekkie<sup>mé</sup>,* to take my trial, the cadée, after exchanging a few words with his naib,† dismissed me fully acquitted.

Not so my own conscience! Loud and ceaseless were its upbraidings. "Thy dagger," it cried, "has been lifted on thy friend; it has killed thy brother; it has struck him to the heart whom it ought to have defended to the last drop of thine own blood; its accursed edge has cut through the holiest of engagements, and doomed to destruction the sincerest piety and the tenderest affection. To the last day of thy life the wound inflicted by thee on Anagnosti shall continue to fester in thine own bosom! it shall remain fresh and green when his mouldering remains have fallen into dust; it shall follow thee beyond the grave; it shall make thee dread to meet thy friend even in the regions of eternal bliss, if it should not eternally shut against thee their inexorable doors."

To hush the relentless monitor, to honour my ill-fated friend's remains, and to appease his shade, I did all that I now could do. I not only had his body carried to the grave in splendid procession, masses performed for his soul, the boiled wheat* distributed in plenty among the congregation, the purest marble sought for a gorgeous tombstone; I myself, clothed as I was in the livery of Mohammed, followed at a distance the dismal pomp, wrapped in the cloak of sadness—my garments soiled, and my head strewed with ashes. From an obscure aisle in the church I beheld the solemn service; saw on the plain of death the pale stiff corpse lowered into its narrow cell, and, hoping to exhaust sorrow's bitter cup, at night when all mankind consigned their griefs to rest, went back to my friend's final resting-place, lay down upon his still, still grave, and watered with my tears the hollow fresh-raised mound.

In vain! Nor my tears nor my sorrows could avail. No offerings nor penance could purchase me repose. Wherever I went, the fatal spot of blood still danced before my steps, and the reeking dagger still hovered in my sight. In the silent darkness of the night, I saw the pale and luminous phantom of my friend stalk around my watchful couch, covered with gore and dust; and even during the noisy meetings of the day to which I fled for relief, I still beheld the spectre rise over the festive board, glare on me with piteous look, and hand me whatever I attempted to reach. But whatever it presented seemed blasted by its touch. To my wine it gave the taste of blood, and to my bread the rank flavour of death!

* The boiled wheat—or colyva, distributed by the Greeks at burials.

I who before had set at naught even the sober creed of the sage, now sought comfort in the silly superstitions of the vulgar. I made offerings to the inexorable Fates. I supplicated the awful Moirai* to withhold from me their scourges. Thinking by swift motion to fly from the vision which every where pursued my steps, I bestrode the swiftest coursers, and roamed the country over. I flew across hill and dale, both early in the morning and late at night—now descending headlong the steep banks of the Propontis, now rushing along the rugged shores of the Euxine.

Among my acquaintance was a rich Armenian. The fondness for handsome horses prevalent among his nation, in him was a perfect passion: but a passion which the jealous laws of the Turks only suffered a rayah to indulge in secret. He might, at an immense cost, keep the most magnificent coursers that came from the rich plains of his own country: bestride them he durst not—except in their stalls: to ride and to enjoy them he was obliged to hire some mean Mohammedan; and as the noble animals often wanted exercise, he was glad to assist me in flying from my sorrows, by giving me the unrestrained use of his stud.

Thus enjoying the command of the fleetest horses and the most active grooms, I took care that neither should want exercise. I devoted my whole time to drawing the bow, and slinging the djereed.† In no place was I seen, but at the ocmeidan and in the hippodrome,‡ where I endeavoured to raise my oppressed spirits by sending them on the wing after a barbed arrow, or a staff that cleft the air. In order to concentrate on one point the whole bent of my faculties, and the whole scope of my feelings, I used to set myself a task.

I resolved to hit a particular mark at an assigned distance, and I left not the spot until I had performed the feat. This practice gave me a dexterity in warlike exercises, of which, at a later period, I reaped the benefit. At the time, the swiftest motion of my body was not sufficient to afford my mind repose. The instant I vaulted into my saddle, the gaunt spectre leaped up behind me. I might walk or I might gallop, saunter along or fly at full speed; yet would he alike goad my galled heart, and with his iron gripe wring my breast to suffocation. If for an instant I breathed more freely, if sometimes I conceived a transient hope that my gloom wore out, it soon proved delusive; and the sun's enfeebled rays scarce in an autumn day at Venice less easily pierce its shroud of chilling mist, than the least glimpse of hilarity broke through the desolation which surrounded my heart.

As a last and desperate resource, I tried to drive away my frightful visions by gayer dreams, the children of drowsy opium. I found my way to the great mart of that deleterious drug, the Theriakée Tchartchee.* There, in elegant coffee-houses, adorned with trelliced awnings, the dose of delusion is measured out to each customer according to his wishes. But lest its visitors should forget to what place they are hying, directly facing its painted porticoes stands the great receptacle of mental imbecility erected by Sultan Suleiman for the use of his capital.

In this tchartchee any day might be seen a numerous collection of those whom private sorrows have driven to a public exhibition of insanity. There each reeling idiot might take his neighbour by the hand, and say, "Brother, and what ailed thee, to seek so dire a cure?" There did I, with the rest of its familiars, now take my habitual station in my solitary niche, like an insensible, motionless idol, sitting with sightless eyeballs, staring on vacancy.

One day, as I lay in less entire absence under the purple vines of the porch, admiring the majestic sulimanye, as it shaded the tchartchee, the appearance of an old man with a snow-white beard, reclining on the couch beside me, caught my attention. Half plunged in stupor, he every now and then burst out into a wild laugh, occasioned by the grotesque phantasms which the ample dose of madjoon† he had just swallowed was sending up to his brain. I sat contemplating him with mixed curiosity and dismay, when, as if for a moment roused from his torpor, he took me by the hand, and fixing on my countenance his dim vacant eyes, said, in an impressive tone, "Young man, thy days are yet few; take the advice of one who has counted many. Lose no time; hie thee hence, nor cast behind one lingering look: but if thou hast not the strength, why tarry even here? Thy journey is but half achieved. At once go on to that large mansion before thee. It is thy ultimate destination; and by thus beginning where thou must end at last, thou mayst at least save both thy time and thy money."

The old man here fell back into his apathy, but I was roused effectually. I resolved to renounce the slow poison of whose havoc my neighbour was so woful a specimen; and in order not even to preserve a memento of the sin I abjured, presented him, as a reward for his advice, with the little golden receptacle of the pernicious drug which I used to carry. He took the bauble without appearing sensible of the gift; while I, running into the middle of the square, pronounced, with outstretched hands,* against the execrable market where insanity was sold by the ounce, an elaborate and solemn malediction.

The curse, I believe, took effect. Certain it is that with me seemed to depart for ever the prosperity of Theriakée Tchatchee. From the day I turned my back upon its fatal abodes the use of wine and spirits may be said in Constantinople to have superseded that of opium. Every succeeding year has seen the trade of madjoon decline faster, and the customers of those that sell it diminish more rapidly. The old worshippers of the poppy juice have dropped off like the leaves in autumn, and no young devotees have sprung up in their stead. The preparation has not even preserved its adherents among those men of the law formerly anxious to combine, through means of a drug that may be taken unperceived, the pleasures of intoxication with the honours of sobriety.

CHAPTER XII.

By degrees my purse, exhausted in the daily purchase of ready-made but ill-wearing mirth, had begun to partake of the depression of my spirits; and on this occasion I found pecuniary embarrassments an excellent remedy for a settled melancholy. When a man knows not how to support life, he has little leisure for feeding sorrow. To replenish, however, my empty coffers, I commenced upon a novel pursuit, which, if it completed the waste of present resources, made me amends by the brilliancy it gave my future prospects.

This I shall explain.

My melancholy, my retirement, and my endeavours to find relief from my sorrow in superstitious practices had brought me in contact with a personage who long since had exchanged the society of man for habitual converse with spirits; and who, disclaiming all further intercourse with the inhabitants of the earth, employed himself solely in cultivating an extensive acquaintance in the different regions of the heavens. The only easy and familiar chit-chat in which my friend Derwish might be said to indulge was with the stars. His accurate information respecting the various occurrences in the firmament, however, gave him so superior an insight into the affairs of this globe, that he felt mortified as well as surprised at seeing, both in potentates and in private individuals, so unaccountable a backwardness to apply for his advice. He was as fond of giving it as those who have not the stars to back their opinion. And, indeed, who more capable than Derwish of directing all the affairs of man? He understood the composition of cabalistic sentences, capable of baffling the subtlest witchcraft, and disarming the most determined evil eye. He could tell to a second the precise period for every critical measure, from the giving a battle, to the taking a dose of physic; and as to casting nativities and predicting seasons, the Venice calendar itself must yield in accuracy to Derwish. It is well known what innumerable little devils float in air, always on the watch, when people inadvertently yawn, to whip into their mouths, and slip down their throats, when they make sad intestine commotion in their stomachs. These he possessed the art of expelling with rare success; and, soon preparing to soar far beyond his former flights, he was at the eve, when I made his acquaintance, of a discovery which promised mines of wealth to whoever might choose to join with him in the speculation. It consisted in ascertaining by the itching of one's fingers what heaps of gold lay buried under those ancient piles which—like the arches of Backtchekéui,* the ruins in Greece, and the pyramids of Egypt—are mistaken by the ignorant for aqueducts, and temples, and mausolea; but by the wise are known to be the secret treasures of the Constantines, the Suleimans, and the Pharaohs of old. The exact value of the deposits known,—what so easy as to pull down the buildings over them?

Ere, however, this could be quite accomplished, other resources, less splendid no doubt, but more acceptable, and in which Eblis† had no hand, lent me their seasonable aid.

One day, when walking on the quay with a brother in distress, "See," said I to my companion, "all those bales of costly goods! For whom think you they are landing? Why, for some old churl, to be sure, nailed to his counter, or buried in his warehouse. Fortune reserves all her favours for those who only know them by a cipher more or less in their ledger. Young fellows, like us, who would proclaim her bounty by sound of trumpet, and show its fruits to the world, she leaves to starve."

"Fortune, gentlemen," observed the caravokeiri‡ of the ship, who had overheard my speech, "is a lady, and as I take it, dislikes not her votaries more than other females do for being young. But to be won, she must be courted."

I now recognised in the captain one of our islanders: He knew me before. "You, sir," added he, "might have had the lady on your own terms, as much as anybody. Who so petted as you were by your worthy deceased mother?"

"What! my mother dead?" exclaimed I, both shocked and surprised.

* The arches of Backtchekéui—magnificent aqueduct near the village of that name, built under the Greek emperors in the pointed style, and which still supplies Constantinople abundantly with water.

† Eblis—his satanic majesty.

‡ Caravokeiri—master of a merchant vessel.

"To be sure," rejoined the reïs; "and, had she known where to find you, ere that happened, who doubts that she would have left her wealth to you rather than to that cross-grained minx—pardon my boldness—your eldest sister."

"All left to my eldest sister," cried I, drying up the tears that had begun to flow. "Ah, if I too had but scolded her all the day long! That at least shows attention, and, it seems, meets with its thanks. Or rather, if she had but scolded me, whenever I deserved reproof. But, she is gone to a better place than her son must hope to see: peace be to my own soul, as it is sure to be to hers!"

"It would not much perhaps disturb its repose," observed my companion, "to have a little tug at your sister; and to try, in your quality as Moslemin, which went furthest, your mother's partiality, or that of the law."

Next to her mother and her husband, Roxana (now the eldest female of the family) had always made me the favourite object of her ill-humour. I owed her a longer score of petty spites than I had ever hoped to wipe out. It would have been a pleasure to me to hustle her out of the inheritance, had it even been for a stranger. Finding, therefore, that the accumulated produce of my mother's estate at Naxia was in the hands of a merchant in Constantinople, in ready cash, I went to claim it. My sole regret on my way was, my not having provided sacks and porters sufficient to carry away the whole treasure at once.

There was little occasion for such a hurry. At first, my mother's fortune scarce seemed easier to get at than the wealth of the Pharaohs coveted by my friend Derwish. In order to obtain it, I found legal forms to go through, certificates to sign, petitions to present, securities to give, and accounts to settle, which only at the end of several weeks allowed me to pocket my money, or rather the half of my money which had not been melted away in the interval, in law expenses, merchant's commissions, presents distributed among men in power, and fees paid to men in office. Even that half, however, my necessities rendered a most welcome supply.

To the landed property at Naxia I could only enforce my right by personal appearance; and a little voyage round the Archipelago seemed to promise a pleasing as well as profitable change of scene. Accordingly, I bargained for my passage in a Greek vessel bound for Ragusa, but intending to touch at Chio. I was not sorry once more, under the protection of the turban, to behold my native home; whence an open boat could easily convey me, when I pleased, to Naxos.

With all these arrangements settled in my mind, I sent my baggage on board; meaning myself to go by land as far as Gallipoli, where the sacoleva* was to ballast. Already, with one foot in the stirrup, was I taking my last leave of all my acquaintance collected around me, when, from a distance, resounded a loud cry of, "Stop him, stop him!" Accordingly I was going to set off as fast as possible—cursing the fellow who had girt my saddle ill, and now detained me to rectify his awkwardness—when, ere I could get away, who should burst through the opening crowd, and seize my bridle like one frantic, but the stargazer Derwish himself!

"Can you," said he, in an angry whisper—thrusting his whole mouth in my ear, "can you think of going after a paltry rabbit warren, when on the very threshold of all the treasures of the universe?"

"Friend," answered I, "accuse the stars; they have been so dilatory in performing their promises, that I disclaim all further engagement with their highnesses."

"Foolish impatience of youth!" resumed Derwish. "But if hope cannot stop you, at least listen to fear. For your sake I have spent the whole night on my roof, watching yon planet. It looks all spleen and malice. Therefore, at any rate, go not till Saturday. Besides, who in his senses sets out upon a journey on any other day?"

"Every day is auspicious," replied I, laughing, "to those who go after their money."

"Hark!" exclaimed the persevering Derwish, "there is the muezzem† of Sultan Achmet, just calling to prayers. Before you go, say your namaz."—"I have said it three times over," replied I. "And the bag of garlic for your horse, against witchcraft?"—"There it dangles." "And the amulets for yourself?"—"Head, stomach, arms, all are stiff with them." "I see," observed my friend, deeply sighing, "you have done every thing for yourself: now do something for me, whom you desert with all my excavations on my hands. It will not cost less than fifty thousand piastres only to undermine the aqueduct, and I have not five paras in the world! Give me at least in advance a couple of sequins."

Derwish had now completely worn out my patience. In order to get rid of him—"This good gentleman," cried I to the bystanders, "only wants to deprive the capital of water, and to prevent the ablutions of the faithful. Pray assist him, as I have not time to stop." Derwish at these words grew frightened; he let go my reins, and slunk away. I rode off, rested during the heat of the day at a village on the road, and in the evening arrived at Gallipoli.

The captain had already taken in his ballast; so we set sail immediately. At the Dardanelles we were detained several hours by private jobs of the crew, of which the custom-house officers bore the blame. Just as we got under sail again, an Israelite, who had heroically determined to go by water whither he could not get by land, begged to be admitted on board. He pleaded poverty so piteously that he was received out of pure charity; it being of course understood that he was to submit with a good grace to whatever tricks the sailors might choose for their diversion to play upon his person. Another Jew, seeing his countryman so readily taken in, begged hard for the same boon; but the sailors, thinking they had provided sufficient pastime for the voyage, now became obdurate, and when the suppliant attempted to creep up the sides of the vessel, unmercifully beat him off. In this operation none was so active as his brother Jew, who, concealed behind the sailors, gave him a sound rap with a long stick over the knuckles every time he attempted to grapple the ship. I could not help noticing this want of charity in one who himself needed so much; but I found it was from the impulses of that very virtue in which I thought him deficient our new guest acted in this way. The other Jew, he informed us, was a rogue, and if admitted, no one could tell what mischief he might do.

We now thought ourselves secure from further intrusion, when a light wherry, skimming the waters like a swallow, shot alongside of us, and flung upon our deck, without waiting for permission at all, a smart caleondjee, whose high behest was to be conveyed to Tenedos. The captain immediately bowed submission.

In this new passenger I soon recognised a personage with whom I had made an acquaintance on board the Turkish fleet during the expedition to the Morea. Never had we met since the failure of the attempt on Mayno. The marine, therefore, felt great pleasure in boasting of the more successful one against the same nest of pirates, undertaken the ensuing year. The delight with which he described how the moohasil of the Morea forced the little peninsula by land, and the capitan-pasha blockaded it by sea; and how the inhabitants, driven by the one out of their strongholds, fell with their boats into the clutches of the other, could only be exceeded by the rapture with which he painted the males all hanged, and the women and children all drowned, in order to reconcile them to the Turkish yoke. "You," he concluded, "who are going to take possession of your estates, mean henceforth, I suppose, to lead a sober country life, and have done with all such frolics. May you prosper! For my part, I hate innocent amusements, and want a little vice to season my pleasures!" Tenedos now being near, my friend called for the boat, and got himself rowed ashore; while I wished him at parting a great deal of pleasure, with all manner of vice.

The current had faithfully escorted us out of the straits; but having fairly seen our ship into the open sea, it here made a deep obeisance, bid our party farewell, and dived away, leaving us for the remainder of the voyage to the care of the winds. These apparently were busy elsewhere. At least none attended our summons; and for several days we were left to confront nothing but a dead calm. Should any one be so fortunate as to have had no acquaintance thus far with the monster ennui, the most favourable situation without doubt for acquiring a thorough knowledge of its powers is on board a vessel so small as to leave no room for exercise, in the midst of a sea so boundless as to offer no object for contemplation, where motionless in one's motionless vehicle one lies for hours watching a cloudless sky for a breeze which stays away, and a waveless sea for a ripple which comes not! In this situation, while all else stands completely still, time itself seems to roll on so heavily, that though every hour of one's short life runs wholly to waste, one yet regrets that it does not waste faster. I, who could only breathe in a bustle, and thrive in a whirlwind, absolutely gasped in this unrelenting stillness of the elements as for breath; and it seemed to deaden in my mind even the sense of pain, which would have been a welcome relief to my listlessness. Fifty times an hour I looked alternately at the sun and at my watch:—I stretched myself; I yawned; I walked the deck lengthwise and crosswise: I listened to the dull jokes of the sailors, and even took part in their lifeless conversation, until I became convinced that tedium levels the various conditions of life far more than love, or even gambling. All my impatience was not of the least use! The sun rose and the sun set; and in the daytime the heavenly vault displayed its uninterrupted azure, and at night the vast firmament twinkled with its innumerable stars, and still we remained in the same spot, with the same headlands ever in sight, and the same uniform sluggish sounds of flapping sails, flaunting ropes, creaking timbers, and groaning mast, ever dinning in our wearied ears. “The worst storm,” cried I, sighing, “would be a thousand times preferable to the nuisance of a calm like this!”

The storm (which happened to lurk within hearing) took me at my word. Scarce had I uttered the wish, than it hastened with all possible alacrity to attend the invitation. A white fleece arose in the distant sky; a dark streak shot across the wave beneath it; a breeze, in short, was felt. This breeze became a gale, and this gale grew to a hurricane. Angry clouds, gathering on all sides, began to travel in every direction through the sky. They met, they crossed, and stopped each other as if to parley, until the whole heavenly vault became a continuous mass of darkness. It would have been difficult to decide which howled the most dismally—the frightened sailors, lowering the yards, closing the hatchways, and clearing the deck—or the frightful blast, mocking their petty endeavours, and tearing and tumbling every thing about our ears. It kept lashing the roaring waves, until they alternately heaved us up on their foaming backs to the sky, or shot us down their dark sides to the very bottom of the sea.

When the tempest became so furious that each sailor would have found employment for a dozen hands, they all wisely left off their work, to fall upon their knees, and say their prayers. Had Saint Spiridion, the protector general of ships in distress, been ears all over, he scarce could have heard or heeded all the vows addressed to him on this occasion. But the more we prayed the more the storm continued blustering, until our ship must inevitably have sunk, had not the sailors providentially hit upon an infallible expedient for appeasing the tempest.

The Jew, who during the whole of the fine weather had made sport for us very handsomely on deck, at the very first lowering of the sky had taken care to dive into the hold among the ballast. Entirely forgotten for a while, he just happened to be remembered at this critical period. All now saw as plain as daylight the whole cause of the hurricane, as well as the remedy; and agreed that nothing could save the ship but dooming the Hebrew to destruction. Fairly tossed into the sea, his life, it was thought, would without fail appease the angry waves.

The poor wretch heard from his hiding-place the appalling sentence. He strove to creep under the loose stones, where he was almost suffocated; but had he nestled in their very heart, like a toad, he could not have escaped. Dragged upon the deck, no entreaty could save him from his impending doom. When, however, with one leg already overboard, he saw himself on the brink of eternity, he begged to ransom his life for money, and the before penniless creature offered, first, one piastre, then two, then five, then a dozen! in order not to be thus turned adrift. But existence was at stake with the sailors as well as with him; and gold had lost its power. They let the Hebrew drop.

Meanwhile I fancied the storm began to slacken. I caught the drowning wretch by his coat, and still keeping him suspended over the roaring abyss, "Hark ye, palikaria,"* said I, to the crew; "the question is not what the scoundrel may deserve for imposing upon our good-nature; it is only what further evils we may suffer by bringing him to condign punishment. Now, if the mere sight of his uncouth figure is sufficient to frighten the sea into these fits, I only ask you, what she will do with his whole ugly carcass—skin and all—crammed down her throat? It will make her throw up—depend upon it—amid fire and flames, some worse morsel than the shoal near Santoreen, which, they say, also came of heedlessly drowning a Jew. Let us therefore appease the ruffled elements only by quietly squeezing his soul out of him on the deck, in the shape of his gold, which it would be a thousand pities to throw to the sharks. In my quality as Moslem, and for my advice, I only claim half the spoil."

The wind by this time having sensibly abated, the proposal was approved of by the majority; the few that looked askance at me were silenced by my frowns; and the Jew, tossed into the vessel again, was extended on the deck to be searched.

Mordecai's vest, trousers, and shirt were shaken out first, but to no purpose! His enormous leather belt was next attacked; and for fear of losing a single scruple of the wealth its weight bespoke, we purposely spread a small ihram* underneath, ere we began the dissection.

All eyes were riveted on the delicate puncture which, while two sailors held the ends of the girdle, I made in the middle of its bloated paunch with the point of my sabre; and scarce was the vein opened than out rushed, with resistless impetuosity, such a stream, not indeed of sequins, but of paras and other trash, as I thought would never cease. The whole, when collected, might amount to two piastres!

The sailors turned pale with disappointment. I sympathized with their feelings. "Son of Satan and of the witch of Endor," exclaimed I, with furious gesture, "Do you wish me to treat you like your belt, and to seek for your treasure in your bowels?" Mordecai was not put to the trouble of answering; for on my clawing his head to give it a shake, his caul remained in my hands—not a mere pliant cap like other cauls, but a positive musket-proof helmet of sequins closely sewed in the cotton! The belt had been a mere decoy. The thought, however, striking me that, where the head was so well furnished, the heels might be worth looking into, I passed from one extremity to the other; and lo! like the dirty caul, the clumsy buskins offered a solid stratum of gold!

His bare person the Jew evidently considered nothing worth; for, hard as he had struggled for life while his gold remained about him, as soon as stripped of his pelf he entreated to be despatched at once. Another vessel just at that moment was hailing us not far off. It had thrown all its water-casks overboard in the storm, and wanted a supply. We granted the request, on condition of sending Mordecai into the bargain, as a great improvement upon the plan of drowning him. He went secured in an empty barrel. I put by my sequins; and the sailors lighted two tapers extraordinary before the Panagia.

The gale which, without remaining utterly unmanageable, had yet not entirely fallen, at last carried us full sail into the straits of Chio, and the distant sound of bells, so long unheard, again struck my ears. Though now become a Mohammedan, it affected me with inexpressible rapture. The feeling of approaching home, however, as it strengthened, became sadder. From what I still hoped to find under the paternal roof, I turned my thoughts to what I was to find no more. My mother had not been the wisest of mothers—as a son I owed her not unlimited gratitude; instead of cultivating what was good, and weeding out the bad germs in my disposition, she first had spoiled me, and then had, in a manner, cast me off, as entirely good for nothing: yet she had been my mother; and however lightly all the later ties of choice or of chance often sat upon my mind, however often I may wantonly have broken the social bands of friendship and of love, the primary claims of nature and of instinct seemed, spite of mine own reasonings, still to maintain their roots firm in my heart.

Absorbed in my musing, I found myself opposite the town of Chio, ere I fancied it in sight. The captain, however, not intending to run into the harbour until the next morning, the boat took us ashore. At first setting foot on the beach, I threw myself on my knees, with both hands gathered up the loved dust of my native land, and bringing it with ecstasy to my lips, “Ah, my own parental soil,” cried I, in a wild rapture, “defiled as thou art by the footsteps of rank barbarians, and by the yoke of ruthless Tartars, still in my soul I worship thee with unceasing devotion; still do thy homely dwellings and thy arid surface more entrance my sated sight, than all the gilded domes of Tchibouklee, and all the gaudy gardens of Sultanieh!”*

As, advancing with hurried steps, I beheld in quick succession the various spots endeared by the incidents of my early years, the agitation of my mind still increased.

* Tchibouklee and Sultanieh—the former a beautiful village, the latter a delightful valley, on the Asiatic shore opposite Constantinople.

Here was the corner of the quay where, with other boys of my age, I used to watch the ships unloading. There, at the turn of the street, stood the house in which on St. John's eve we played at kleidon rysika.* A little farther on I passed by the abode of our ancient paramana,† whose nursery tales I still could listen to with pleasure. Right over the way my eye fell on the fatal window whence, at Easter, a whole load of broken pots and pans—the wrecks of a twelvemonth‡—fell on my devoted head. Before I had quite done looking with some still remaining fright at its threatening aperture, I stumbled over the steps of the cross old witch's hovel whose flesh-pot I filled one day with glue, in revenge for her complaints of me. I was still inwardly laughing at the remembrance of her fruitless attempts to uncloset her toothless gums, when I grazed the stone seat of a house where—But at present pass we on! Suffice it to say, that out of the desolate open entrance there seemed to rush a chilling blast, which, hastily as I darted by, changed the warm moisture on my forehead into a cold clammy dew!

In this way did an uninterrupted chain of recollections carry me on from the waterside to my paternal threshold. There, all seemed solitude and desolation. The only acquaintance remaining, the only being that gave me welcome, was Xeno the old dog—procured when a puppy from the consul, and reared by myself. Many a time he had stood sentinel during my meetings with the donor's daughter; and when I fled from my home, I had been obliged to tie him to a post on the quay, lest he should follow me to the ship, and betray me by his fidelity. He still seemed to remember his old master, looked up in my face as if to say, “what had he done to be thus deserted,” and wagging his tail, licked my hand. His joyous yelping brought down an unknown female of uncourteous appearance, who asked my business. Having told her its nature, she desired me to go to the garden in the Campo, where the signor drogueman at present resided.

The objects I met in my way to the country were quite as interesting as those which I had passed in the town. But in the one, as in the other, I perceived a change which quite confounded all my calculations. Every thing still stood in the same place; every thing still preserved the same shape as before; but the dimensions appeared totally altered. What I thought I had left huge, gigantic, vast as the tower of Babel, now, to my infinite surprise, seemed paltry, diminutive, reduced to the size of a child's plaything. Houses, gardens, hills, and dales, all looked as if, since my childhood, they had shrunk to half their primitive size. A few steps brought me to the end of what I thought covered acres; and what formerly I fancied reared its head in the sky, now hardly rose out of ground. I had left my home impressed with the magnitude of every object! to the first images imprinted in my memory I had assimilated all the vaster scenes which I since had beheld; and only now I first perceived the difference; and, from the comparison, thought what I saw even smaller than it was.

My long strides soon brought me abreast with a little man, advanced in years, who was hobbling on before me. The few additional wrinkles that furrowed his face could not prevent my recognising in him the Signor Polizoï, an old friend of the family; while to his failing eyesight my change from boy to man left me an entire stranger. As in that capacity I must have the more to learn, he seemed to increase in the same proportion the natural communicativeness of his disposition. At my request he went regularly over all the members of the paternal house, until he came to a certain graceless youth, named Anastasius, who, he informed me in a sort of confidential whisper, was the saddest reprobate that ever had disgraced Chio; insomuch that even he, Polizoï—a primate as he was—never felt safe from his pranks while yet only a boy; and if he met him now, would, he verily believed, die with positive terror!

Far be from me all suspicion of an intent to commit murder, in not resisting the too powerful temptation to acquaint the old gentleman that this reprobate actually stood before him. Thunderstruck at the intelligence, he stared at me some time in silent and motionless horror; then suddenly wheeled about, and scampered away. My calling till I grew hoarse could neither bring him back, nor stop his progress. Some block of stone, I fancy, was more persuasive; for I heard a loud tumble, and would have gone to his assistance, when the sight of our door drove all other thoughts away.

I paused a few seconds on the threshold. Signor Polizoi's speech had taught me to expect little kindness; "and might it not," thought I, "be preferable to fancy what was best, than to be certain of the worst?" But that worst I might make best by my change of deportment! I therefore entered.

As I ascended the steps, and under the trellice of the landing caught my father's voice, grown tremulous with age, my heart began to throb. He was conversing with his friends; and the ceaseless grinding of the water-wheel* in the yard prevented his hearing my approach. Unprepared, he saw me stand before him. Perceiving his surprise at the appearance of one in the Moslem dress, walking in thus familiarly, "Sir," said I, "you see your son." At these words my father started; yet he seemed moved, and made a sort of gesture to bid me welcome; but again, suddenly checking himself, as he caught my brother Constantine's eye scanning his countenance: "The sons I know," observed he, dryly, "when they greet me, begin by kissing my hands: I know none other. Perhaps you are only come to wrest from them their remaining property, and to leave me, in my old age, to beg my bread."

I was going to make the only fit reply in my power; to throw myself on the ground; to kiss, not my father's hands, but his feet; to beg his blessing, and to renounce his property, when my ungracious brother stepped in between the purpose and the deed, to mar all my good intent. "I made no doubt," said he, in a brutal tone, "that after disgracing your family by your conduct, you would wish to brave it by your presence; but truly, you should avoid the air of Christian houses. It can do you no good, and to us your breath is pestilence."

At any other time such a speech would instantly have been resented. But I felt this the decisive moment of my life. I stood at the turn between good and evil. I determined to repress my rising wrath, though I should choke in the attempt.

"Sir," said I, to my father, looking earnestly in his face, while the tears ran down my cheek, "is it your pleasure that I should be treated thus?"

* The ceaseless grinding of the water-wheel—used in the gardens of Chio to irrigate the numerous plantations of orange-trees.

"This unexpected appeal to his feelings seemed for a moment to stagger my parent. But whether it was that he felt awed by my brother, who ruled him with a rod of iron, or that his own heart had entirely ceased to plead for Anastasius, "Stanco," said he, coldly, "is in the right. You ought, ere this, to have perceived that your company is not acceptable. We can have nothing to interchange with each other. Go, therefore, and disturb us no longer."

At these harsh words my heart swelled till it was ready to burst. Lest my enemies should have the pleasure of beholding me unmanned, I turned away, and leaned over the stone parapet. Had Constantine not been by, I should have made another attempt to sooth my less determined father. In his presence, I knew it must be fruitless. Yet I lingered on. I could not bring myself to depart. I still hoped to be called back. Alas! I only staid to hear my brother propose, in an audible whisper, to have me turned out.

Turned out of my father's house! It was too much. I rushed away!

Sacred walls of the parental mansion, I call you to witness! By your moaning echoes denounce me a wretch to all future ages,—be the name of Anastasius in my native land the name of guilt, and among foreign nations a title of disgrace, if I entered not your sacred threshold with feelings of love, of peace and of submission! They were rejected; they were spurned. Let those thank themselves for other sentiments who strove to obtain them!

In three strides I cleared—I do not know how—the fourteen steps of the precipitous stone flight; and got out at the gate. Then, turning round to the unkind habitation, I stopped, once more to contemplate—but for the last time—its well-remembered features; before always smiling, now frowning upon me. "Dear abode," exclaimed I, "where first I received the now irksome boon of life, adieu for ever! Anastasius no more shall come within thy shade! If he do, may it prove to him the shade of death!" This said, I hurried away, as if pursued by all the fiends of hell; and in less than half an hour again reached the town.

Ah! how often does it happen in life that the most blissful moments of our return to a long-left home are those only that just precede the instant of our arrival; those during which the imagination still is allowed to paint in its own unblended colours, the promised sweets of our reception! How often, after this glowing picture of the phantasy, does the reality which follows appear cold and comfortless! How often do even those who grieved to see us depart grieve more to see us return; and how often we ourselves only suffer sorrow on again beholding the friends once left happy, gay, and dispensing joy to others, now mournful, disappointed, and themselves needing what consolation we may bring!

CHAPTER XIII.

THE visit to my father was not the only fearful duty I had to perform. Another and more appalling task remained to be achieved. Of this, however, the nature was such as no longer to leave room either for hope or fear. I knew the worst, and grievously did that worst oppress my heart. Helena—my first love—Helena was no more! At Constantinople, in the hey-day of my devotion to the fair Esmé, I had heard her mournful fate. The moment my flight from Chio was known, she made a full confession. To avoid unavailing exposure, the consul sent her for change of air to Samos. There she was attended by one of those nuns of St. Ursula who, in our islands, double the merit of their chastity by disclaiming the defence of a convent. Wretched from the first, Helena, as the hour of maternal anguish approached, became every day more impressed with the idea that she should not survive it. In this persuasion she wrote me a letter, which she confided to the nun, and soon after gave birth to a dead child. In conformity with her foreboding fears, or rather, perhaps, in consequence of her apprehensions, she only survived her babe a few hours. The nun had made a solemn promise not to part with her trust except into my own hands. She however sent me word at Constantinople that it only waited my return to my home. Hearing that she now lived at Chio, and only a short distance from the town, I went to claim the melancholy bequest. I found Sister Agnes at home, and alone. The people with whom she boarded were gone to a neighbouring fair.

The nun had heard me described as a fair complexioned Greek boy, with a smooth skin and flowing locks. No wonder, therefore, that, in the swarthy rough-cheeked Moslemin, with forehead bare and shaded lip, she should not recognise the original of her fancied portrait. The first sight of my fierce figure, standing unannounced before the lonely maiden, made her start with evident surprise; but when I showed her a note from Anastasius, whose handwriting had met her eye before, she became more composed, and gave me the history of Helena's sufferings. Touched with a sense of shame for the ruin I had heaped upon the innocent girl, I had determined, while I remained in the presence of her friend, not to deposit my assumed character, but to hear the tale of woe to the end with pretended unconcern. Soon, however, unbidden tears would start, and began to flow so fast, that for fear of betraying my feelings I hid my face in my cloak. Even that could not conceal from the quick-sighted nun the anguish which throbbed beneath its gaudy trappings. "I wonder not, sir," said she, "to see you moved. In truth, the story is touching, and calculated to affect even the stout heart of an Osmanlee. But to behold such deep emotion in a stranger! while the author of so much woe, while Anastasius himself—"

Here all control over my tongue forsook me. "I am that Anastasius," cried I; "could you a moment doubt it?"

The nun appeared confounded. Shuddering with horror at finding herself thus unconsciously in the actual presence of him whom she looked upon as her friend's murderer; as little less than a devil incarnate—a complete fiend!—she darted at me the gesture of anathema,* and to the dread sign added such dire imprecations, that I could not help mechanically uncovering my breast, and wetting it with the moisture of my lips,† to avert the evil influence. This action, however, did not prevent a torrent of more explicit abuse from following the first vague explosion of anger; and a full quarter of an hour did Sister Agnes rant, and rave, and sputter, ere I could find an opportunity of claiming the letter I had been promised.

* The gesture of anathema—directing the outstretched hands and fingers towards the object of imprecation.

† With the moisture of my lips—the mode in which the Greeks think to avert the influence of the evil eye or other ominous circumstances.

With a hand still trembling with rage, she at last took it out of a small casket, and bade me read—with compunction if I could—the last words of my lovely and murdered mistress.

They were these :

“I neither reproach you with my ruin, which was my own fault, nor with your want of love, which was not yours. It depends not on ourselves to love ; but it does to be merciful, and you were inhuman : you deliberately pierced that heart in which you were worshipped, and of this deed I die. On a foreign shore I soon shall breathe my last, and my wretched father, who expected in me the comfort of his old age, shall see me no more. Thanks be to God ! the author of my unfortunate existence shall not have to blush at the sight of his daughter ; nor shall I, wont to look up with the confidence of innocence, have to avert my eyes with shame from a parent. For the unfortunate offspring—I dare not say of our love—which perhaps may survive me, I must not claim a father’s care. You have trod under foot the duties which you owed her who in the eye of Heaven was your wife, and had committed no offence, except loving you too ardently. My child will be abandoned to the hands of strangers ; will live in contempt, and die in misery. But should Heaven ever bestow upon you the pledges of a less ill-requited affection, fear, ah fear lest my infant’s wrongs be visited upon them ! Yet, if the last words of a wretch, who is afraid her love will only cease with her life, can find entrance into your too impenetrable heart, ah, Anastasius ! ah, my Anastasius ! repent of your sins, run not from crime to crime, and revenge not my woes so severely on yourself as to leave us no chance of ever meeting again.”

The time that had intervened between the writing and the perusal of this letter might already be counted by years. The fair writer had ceased, not only to exist, but to be the subject of the public talk. The guilty individual to whom it was addressed was from a boy become a man. The event of which he was the worthless hero had been forgotten, even in the district where it took place, for more recent adventures, and the very ink of the admonition had already become pale. Still did my heart feel every sentence of the appeal as if in all the freshness of its first inditing. It forgot the lapse of time, and became filled at once with sadness as sincere and profound as if Helena’s last despairing sighs still were breathing on my ear! Keeping the sacred characters pressed to my lips, I struck my heaving bosom, and flung myself on the floor. "Here," cried I, "let me lie, and commune undisturbed with my wretched soul; here let me shed tears of blood for her whom I first learned to prize, when through my fault I had lost her for ever!"

Had Sister Agnes known the omnipotence of mercy—had my penitent, my humble suit been unconditionally granted, who knows what richer fruits my first contrition by degrees might have borne. None such were in store for the destroyer of Helena! The nun, the fatal nun, more impelled by vanity than by friendship, more anxious to see my sex humbled than her own exalted, was not satisfied with my writhing under the reproaches of my own conscience, unless I also smarted from the sting of her viper tongue. So keenly did she sharpen its dart, so many little punctures did she one by one inflict, so much venom did she pour into each wound, that resentment at last left not room for regret, and instead of slowly rising with resolves of amendment, I hastily started up with schemes of revenge. A mean, ungenerous triumph over one already prostrate deserved an exemplary punishment; and Sister Agnes had wondered so much how one like me could have charmed her lost friend, that it seemed but justice to that friend to let her wonder no longer.

Assuredly, Sister Agnes, who so often had heard the awful tale of my unworthiness, and so closely had witnessed the last pangs of my victim; Sister Agnes, whose green curses still pursued me when her friend's less wrathful farewell was already faded by time; Sister Agnes, who to a worthy and discreet lover of her own had shown the most perverse and relentless hard-heartedness: Sister Agnes, I say, ought, of all women upon earth, to have been the least accessible to the lures of my tongue; and, both from her knowledge of me and her respect for Helena, to have most victoriously resisted my most persevering suit: but it seems as if all these circumstances only had combined to manifest either my superior gifts or the nun's excessive weakness: for whether warmed by her own tale, or surprised by the coolness of my abrupt attack, when from sheer bitterness of heart I offered the semblance of a very different feeling, she neither checked my boldness nor resented my behaviour; and though I employed neither promises nor threats, appearance of love nor demonstrations of esteem, soon lived to owe virtue only to my contemptuous forbearance, and to entitle me—after the haughty dame had sneeringly exclaimed, “You of all men!”—to retort by exclaiming with equal emphasis, in my turn in the same tone—“and you of all women!”

Notwithstanding the ill success of my visit to my father, I had not yet given up all hopes of being restored to his favour. Knowing the uselessness of any attempt at a conciliatory interview, where I felt sure my brother would remain on the watch to efface its impressions, I penned a letter replete with every possible offer of submission and sacrifice, consistent with my safety as a follower of Islam, and sent it to its destination by a common friend. Independent of the force of paternal feelings in the head of the family, I depended upon the suggestions of policy in the younger branches. Hatred prevailed over prudence, and I received no answer! After lingering several days in fruitless expectation, I at last prepared to leave Chio.

Ever since the sight of home had revived ancient recollections, and with them the remorse for ancient misdeeds, I had panted for a journey to Samos, there to perform on the lonely grave of my Helena the sad rites of contrition and penance. On the morning of my own birthday, I proceeded to the not far island, whose privileged earth held the sacred deposite; landed on its rocky shore early in the afternoon, and ere the evening cast its lengthened shadows around, reached the hallowed spot, sole object of my visit.

The sun's departing rays were just gliding from the moss-grown tomb. I approached it with awe: strewed upon it the wild flowers which had grown in its shade; bedewed its silent stones with tears of grief and remorse, and over the ill-fated treasure underneath poured out my heart's bitter anguish in alternate groans and prayers. The whole night Helena's gravestone was my pillow; and early the next morning, ere yet the orb of day rose out of the sparkling wave—making my dagger my pen—I traced on the dusky slab, as on the recording roll, my Christian, my Grecian, my old name ANASTASIUS—filled in the deep sunk characters with the hot stream from my own bosom; and exclaiming, “with the purple of my own blood I sign the marriage contract!”* I make thee mine in death, and make thee mine in life hereafter!”

* With the purple of my own blood I sign, &c.—Alluding, I suppose, to the custom of the Greek emperors of signing their name with purple.

For the last time imprinted my quivering lips on the cold marble, and rushed away from death's receptacle, which I had made my nuptial couch.

By this expiatory visit I felt my heart somewhat relieved. I thought my Helena might, from the higher regions wheré she dwelt, have viewed, if not in forgiveness, at least in pity, my tardy atonement; and with a lightness of soul to which I long had been a stranger, I proceeded to Paros, and there spent a day or two with some of my old kinsmen. Dull, stupid islanders as they were, they entertained me not the less kindly for being out of favour at Stamboul, and when I went on to Naxia, actually expressed a wish that I might visit them again!

At Naxos reigned supreme, under the wide-spreading wing of Hassan-pasha's all-powerful protection, my maternal cousin Marco Politi, heir to all the favour which the papas his uncle had enjoyed before him with the grand admiral, and sole epitrope* of the Greek villages that cover the island. From every one of these individually might this wily and ambitious personage be said to wage an incessant warfare against the Latin inhabitants of the city; and if the Grimaldis, the Giustinians, and the Barozzis of yore once caused Marco's forefathers to groan under the weight of the Venetian yoke, amply did Marco now make the miserable relics of these proud families pay for the sins of their slumbering ancestors. He kept them absolutely shut up in their citadel and towers. Fearful of letting down their drawbridges to take a stroll in the fields, they envied their own flocks of pigeons the liberty of their roamings, and seemed perched up in their lofty habitations for no other purpose than to have a better bird's-eye view of their adversary, leisurely walking forth to skim the fatness of the land, and going his rounds among the peasantry to reap the choicest fruits, and to levy his tithe on its fine wines, its fragrant oils, its rich honey, and its delicious cream—while they, to beguile gnawing hunger, often only had the hollow feast of their ancestors' mouldering insignia clumsily earved over their melancholy gates! Such was their dread of Marco's hostility and power, that whenever he made a trip to Constantinople the whole nobility of Naxos took to their beds in expectation of some new avaniah.†

* Epitrope—primate of a Greek community.

† Avaniah—name given to a contribution imposed by Turks on rayahs, on some unfounded pretence.

Of his own villages Marco was the idol. Like other idols, indeed, he was not to be worshipped empty-handed. But he hated the Latins so cordially, that it was universally allowed he must feel an unbounded love for his Greek countrymen. The more, therefore, in his management of the haratsch and the other contributions to the Turks, he squeezed out their inmost substance into his own reservoirs, the more he was thanked for his disinterestedness and public spirit. If Marco had any private foibles, they were, like those of other great men, deemed more than atoned for by his public virtues. This was his own opinion also; and it even appeared, as he observed, to be that of the higher powers themselves, from the frequent signal interpositions of Providence in his favour, and the almost miraculous manner in which his greatest enemies had been disabled from putting their wicked purposes against him in execution, by almost always disappearing—nobody knew how or where—just at the juncture when he seemed exposed to the greatest danger, or involved in the most inextricable difficulties.

It was from a kinsman thus mighty and thus fortunate, that within his own dominions I, a poor unprotected stranger, had to claim an estate, which he called my mother's indeed, but which for upwards of five-and-twenty years he had taken care to nurse as his own. My first point for consideration, therefore, on landing was, whether I should at once offer to him my unwelcome visage, or first keep myself in abeyance until I had tried my ground. It was not exactly the dictates of reason which decided my conduct. During the conflict in my mind, I filled, by way of assisting my judgment, a cup of that delicious muscadell in which I was credibly assured Theseus had on that very spot pledged Ariadne. But just when in contact with my lips, the still untasted glass slipped through my fingers, as the hero did through those of the nymph. "I accept the favourable omen," cried I (to my Frank readers it may not appear such), and resolved to dare my antagonist at once. "Let me seem to fear no one," was my maxim, "and some may fear me."

Upon this I immediately set out for the village of Trimalia, where the primate resided. He was employed with his men in the fields. The day being sultry, I threw off my cloak in a corner of the house, and went out with a servant in search of his master. We found Marco in a little valley, under an old olive-tree, in the midst of his farmers, finishing a frugal repast. He appeared to be eating with uncommon relish a crust of black barley-bread, and enlarging with great earnestness on its peculiar excellence and flavour, when my salutation interrupted the eulogy.

My tone was civil, but decided. I told his primateship, that in conformity to the established custom of informing near relations and friends of especial calamities, I had thought it my duty to acquaint him with the misfortune I had had of turning Mohammedan; and added, how very much I regretted my being obliged, out of respect for my new religion, to claim my mother's estate, till then intrusted to his management. This circumstance he regretted as sincerely as myself; and the more when I hinted how absolutely my particular situation prohibited me from disregarding the partiality of the Moslem law to its new proselytes, and the powerful support I was promised by the Turkish ministers in maintaining my privilege, and which, to say the truth, I a little exaggerated. At the conclusion of my speech, however, I assured my cousin that I did not think my obligations to my new creed so very strict, but that I might consider myself warranted in some degree to proportion my facility in passing old and intricate accounts to the alacrity I found in giving up the trust.

Much against my expectation, my relation expressed entire readiness to conform to circumstances. No exception was taken to any part of my statement. Nay, my avowed determination to disregard all opposition seemed rather to increase Marco's apparent cordiality and frankness. He even pressed me so earnestly to take up my abode with him during my stay at Naxos, that I found some difficulty in handsomely declining the offer; but my obstinacy being equal to his solicitation, I at last, after fixing the time the next day when I was to return and enter upon business, took my leave, and bent my steps towards the town.

Scarce had I gone three hundred yards, when I remembered the cloak I had left behind. Returning back to the house the shortest way across the fields to fetch it, my path led me by the side of a thick lentiscus hedge which surrounded the garden. To this my cousin had by this time retired with his confidential agent, for the purpose of more private conversation. As I approached, I could not help hearing my own name uttered with such emphasis, that I was tempted to stop and indulge for a few minutes in the contemplation of the beautiful shrubs which formed the enclosure. Meantime Marco was proceeding with his conversation. "Cannot you understand," said he to his confidant, in rather a louder tone than became so wary a personage, "that if I had attempted at once to oppose his claim, he would immediately have resorted to the most effective means for enforcing his demands, and the world would infallibly have joined him in condemning my proceedings; whereas, by admitting his title in the gross, I begin by lulling asleep his suspicions, gain credit with others for fair dealing, and then, by every quibble about the items, and every delay in the forms of law, defeat his purpose in detail, and tire out his very heart, before he gets from me a single inch of his estate?" This plan of the campaign seemed so well worth an old cloak, that I left mine for the present unclaimed, and, wheeling about, went straight to the town.

But I had my cue for the interview of the next day. When, therefore, I found in the course of the discussion to which it led the more Marco explained the less I understood, and that certainly I was much less master of the subject at the conclusion of the sitting than I thought myself at the opening, I rather abruptly broke off the conference, and rising, said, in the smoothest tone I was master of, "Hark ye, cousin; I make no doubt that you have brought forward every quibble concerning the items, and equally mean to use every delay in the forms of law, which belong to so able a diplomatist; but this I would have you remember, that when, thanks to its unraveller, a business is become so thoroughly entangled as to defy the keenest intellect, I know but of one way to cut the knot asunder; and that," added I, pointing to my yatagan, "is with a good Damascus blade; and so fare ye well."

Marco was fonder of diplomacy than of fighting. He knew his cousin to be a desperate fellow, and he began to think his agent a traitor. In this double apprehension, he delivered over the whole concern into my hands, including every deed, agreement, bill, and receipt, accumulated upon the estate since the last clearance of the deluge. "What a thing it is," thought I, "to show a little mettle!"

But I soon found I had by mine got more than enough. Many of the transactions relative to the property, in the way Marco had managed them, were to me inexplicable enigmas, and this the scoundrel knew. The moment I was proclaimed sole possessor of the estate, and sole respondent for every claim relating to it, there came upon me a host of creditors of every description, from the bishop who had witnessed my mother's will to the moiro-logistri* who had wept at her funeral, which I verily believe Marco had kept back on purpose for the occasion. With this posse constantly at my heels, I did not know which way to turn myself. My cousin Marco, meanwhile, was all at once become so very discreet, as to decline interfering even in the smallest trifle, or offering his opinion on the simplest question, until he had the satisfaction of seeing me fairly worn out with business and with perplexity. He then ventured to suggest that the science of accounts did not seem to be that which was most congenial to my disposition, and proposed (but with the sole view of relieving me) to take over the estate entirely for a round sum of money. Convinced by this time that every fresh step I took in the management would only lead to fresh confusion, I was become vastly more tractable, and so, after a little demur, agreed to have the property valued. This was done by arbitrators, all so very liberal in their concessions on my part, that the estate was estimated at about half its real worth. But this half was tendered in ready cash; and taking into consideration what most men who drive close bargains seem entirely to overlook, the waste of time, temper, and breath in standing out for more, I accepted the sum offered, signed the proper receipts, put my capital into my bag, and took leave of Marco to return to the town.

Whether or not I might think the money too little to take, Marco evidently still thought it too much to part with. Most kindly he had stationed two of his trustiest myrmidons in a narrow lane only just outside his gate, in order to rid me of the burthen as soon as possible. At my going he so earnestly recommended the utmost caution, and so pathetically lamented the unsafeness of the path, that it struck me he must have good authority for his surmises, and considered I could not show my sense of his solicitude more effectually than by avoiding altogether the road to which he gave so ill a character. Accordingly, I waited not even till I was out of my cousin's premises; but as soon as out of his sight jumped nimbly over a hedge, and soon got entirely clear of his outpost. I might never have more than surmised the favour intended for me, had I not learned all the particulars of the scheme the very next day from his own deputy. This worthy person, having been drubbed by his master for not stopping me, came to demand a compliment for the civility of his forbearance. "Then," said I, "you really saw me pass by?" "Yes." "And intentionally permitted my escape?" "No doubt." "Nor let me go home unmolested only because you could not help it?" "No, indeed." "If so," exclaimed I, "Heaven forbid I should encourage disobedience in servants! You were sent by your principal to rob me, and you ought to have done as you were bid. Here is all the compliment I can in conscience make." Upon which I gave the fellow a second drubbing, and desired him to inform his master of my proceeding; but this he neglected.

From that day forward, however, I thought it prudent not to take long walks by myself in the country; nor to put the obedience of my cousin Marco's servants a second time to the test. I remained chiefly among the Latin inhabitants of the castle, until a conveyance should offer for some other place, which only seldom occurs in an island destitute of harbour, and rarely visited by ships. But my time hung far from heavy upon my hands. I was treated among the Catholics, in my quality of Moslem, with very great deference. The chancellor held my stirrup; the fiscal lit my pipe, and the archbishop—an entertaining old capuchin—used, he swore, when I went out, to recite prayers in his chapel for my safe return. I paid these civilities in Constantinople news. What I brought not I made; but this only rendered it the more novel and acceptable. All I regretted was occasioning a schism between church and state. I had spread the report of a secret correspondence between the grand signor and the pope on an intended conversion of the former to the Catholic faith; and upon this the chancellor and the archbishop quarrelled who should sign the address of congratulation. Before the question was decided, a khirlangitsch* of the admiralty, which had spent the summer in a fruitless chase of the Maltese corsairs, cast anchor at St. Mary's in the neighbouring island of Paros, and induced me to take my departure. Just on setting out, however, a perhaps too fastidious scruple arose in my mind. I did not like to go without making my cousin Marco some acknowledgment for his last mark of attention, however unsuccessful it had been. Five or six honest lads were come from the khirlangitsch to fetch me away in their boat. With a handful of Marco's own piastres I made it worth their while to convey to the primate my leave-taking in the most cordial manner. But as my cousin had taught me by his example how necessary it is for the master's eye to watch delicate commissions, I—superintended the business myself. From the high bank of the lane which led to Marco's fields I had the satisfaction not only of seeing my relation soundly bastinadoed, but of condoling with him as pathetically as he had done with me on the unsafeness of the path. This performed, ere he had time to get up and to crawl home, I bade him adieu, scampered away with my associates to the boat which lay waiting under a cliff only a few hundred yards off, and was rowed to Parecchia. From that port I got in a few hours, across the mountains, to St. Mary's and on board the khirlangitsch.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE cutter which touched at Paros so conveniently was on its way to receive the annual contribution of part of the circumjacent islands, and was to finish its cruise at Rhodes. This destination perfectly suited my purpose. In want of occupation, and without any precise aim, Rhodes promised a scene of interest to which I hastened with pleasure.

As my former connexions with the arsenal gave me a certain predilection for whatever belonged to the navy, I speedily formed an acquaintance with one of the tchawooshes of the capitan-pasha, who, like myself, was only a passenger. Aly was his name, and Crete his country. This latter circumstance added much, in my eyes, to the merit of his society. The Turks of Candia, by their constant intermarriages with Greek women, to whom they permit every latitude of worship, become divested of much of their Mohammedan asperity, and Aly, himself half a Greek, was not entitled to any great prejudice against me for being only half a Turk. In the refinements of his toilet, however, Aly-ichawoosh might be considered as a finished Osmanlee. Nothing could exceed the exquisite taste of his apparel. His turban attracted the eye less even by its costliness of texture than by its elegance of form. A band of green and gold tissue, diagonally crossing the forehead, was made with studious ease, by its oblique position, completely to overshadow one ear, and as completely to display the other. From its fringed extremity always hung suspended like a tassel, a rose or a carnation, which, while it kept caressing the wearer's broad and muscular throat, sent up its fragrance to his disdainful nostril. An hour every day was the shortest time allotted to the culture of his adored mustachios, and to the various rites which these idols of his vainglorious heart demanded; such as changing their hue from a bright flaxen to a jetty black, perfuming them with rose and amber, smoothing their straggling hairs, and giving their taper ends a smart and graceful curve. Another hour was spent in refreshing the scarlet die of his lips, and tinting the dark shade of his eyelids, as well as in practising the most fascinating smile and the archest leer which the Terzhana* could display. His dress, of the finest broadcloth and velvet, made after the most dashing Barbary cut, was covered all over with gold embroidery, so thickly embossed as to appear almost massive. His chest, uncovered down to the girdle, and his arms, bared up to the shoulder, displayed all the bright polish of his skin. His capote was draped so as with infinite grace to break the too formal symmetry of his costume. In short, his handjar with its gilt handle, his watch with its concealed miniature, his tobacco-pouch of knitted gold, his pipe mounted in opaque amber, and his pistols with diamond-cut hilt, were all in the style of the most consummate petit maître; and if, spite of all his pains, my friend Aly was not without exception the handsomest man in the Othoman empire, none could deny his being one of the best dressed. His air and manner harmonized with his attire. A confident look, an insolent and sneering tone, and an indolent yet swaggering gait, bespoke him to be, what indeed it was his utmost ambition to appear, a thorough rake. Noisy, drunken, quarrelsome, and expert alike in the exercise of the bow (the weapon of his country) and in that of the handjar, he possessed every one of the accomplishments of those heroes chiefly met with on the quays of Constantinople and the other principal seaports in the Othoman empire, whom a modest woman avoids, and to whom a respectable man always gives way.

Intimacies are soon contracted at sea; and Aly was too vain to keep up much reserve. He soon favoured me with an account of some of his adventures! "My dear fellow," said he, one day, "I would have you know that from my earliest infancy I always had the most decided taste for idleness; and this ruling passion of my heart has never ceased increasing. The only agreeable occupation I could ever devise was doing nothing. Whatever lures were held out to me by fortune, they lost all their charms to my eye the moment their pursuit required the least exertion. Not for an empire would I give up my dear laziness. At the same time, next to doing nothing, my chief delight always consisted in spending a great deal of money. Unfortunately, I was not one of the privileged few who can afford to indulge both these tastes at once. My luck, however, made me succeed in some little commissions for the governor of the Canea, which gained me his good-will; and his good-will, in its turn, gained me an employment in which I was enabled to enjoy my two chief conditions of earthly happiness, if not together, at least alternately. It was that of tcha-woosh or messenger of the capitan-pasha. You know the jolly lives these gentry lead; you also know the scanty wages they receive: and you moreover know the splendid figure they are expected to make. I have always suspected our grandees, so profuse in their presents to other people's servants, and so niggardly in their salaries to their own followers, of having made a secret agreement with each other, by which each was to support his neighbour's retinue instead of his own. It is but justice to us to say, that we do all in our power to give effect to this contract; for you cannot but remember how, at the Terzhana, we lie in wait for every hapless stranger, whose evil stars inflict upon him business with our pasha; what fees we exact for every audience he craves, and for every favour he receives. The utmost produce, however, of the fines levied in the capital, would but indifferently defray the expenses of our apparel, board, &c., were it not for the chance of being each in our turn intrusted with some lucrative commission in the provinces.

“For my part, I never, till I saw my wishes fulfilled, ceased praying Allah, both morning and evening, that he might be pleased to whisper in the pasha’s ear a word in my favour, and make him employ his servant Aly as his representative in some lucrative negotiation. The occasion on which my prayers were granted was this: Certain Speciate* adventurers had waylaid a Greek vessel bound for Ancona, and not yet knowing—poor souls—the difference ’twixt good and evil, had in the innocence of their hearts sold both cargo and ship in their own native place, among their own fellow-citizens, all more or less engaged in the same primitive sort of profession with themselves. On an application from the owners of the vessel, I was sent to Specia to recover the property, and to bring to justice the culprits. We gentlemen of the short dress carry little ballast, and when we have a prize in view, know the value of time. I no sooner had received my instructions than I hoisted my pennant and set sail. Not that my journey was quite as expeditious as my departure was prompt. Ships at sea sail not always as the crow flies. Besides, one has often to seek a conveyance as chance may offer it. In addition to which, I thought it would be showing a proper respect for the grand admiral my patron, to represent his person in some of the smaller islands on my way. This cost him nothing, nor me either. Every where I found board and lodging gratis. I was made welcome to all the necessaries of life—among the foremost of which I reckon its superfluities; and at my departure, never failed to receive a small present for the honour conferred on the place, for which I always took care, in return, to promise my protection.

“By my deliberate mode of proceeding, I gave the fame of my approach time to precede me to Specia: for I did not wish to take any unfair advantage of its inhabitants by coming in upon them unawares, and before they had had sufficient leisure to prepare for my reception. The island is so small, and its population so scanty, that, but for some little management of this sort, I could not have avoided stumbling upon the poor wretches whom I was sent in quest of, at the very first step; and this, considering how essential it was to them to avoid my sight, would have been most unhandsome. Such was the confidence I inspired by the humanity of this proceeding, that the plunderers of the merchantman did not even seek concealment on the news of my actual arrival, but treated me with an openness of behaviour quite equal to my own. To have taken advantage of such frankness of conduct, I must have been callous to all liberal feelings. As the rogues assured me therefore upon their honour that they had already ate and drank three-fourths of the produce of their prize, I only exacted restitution of the fourth which remained. Not wishing, however, to mortify my employers by restoring to them so small a portion of their property, I put it into my own pocket. My conciliatory spirit gained me universal esteem; and the inhabitants—all more or less liable to the same errors—showered upon me from all quarters presents of all descriptions: sheep, kids, fowls, and other live, as well as dead stock. Just as I was considering to what market I should carry my perquisites, this vessel hove in sight. I thought the opportunity a good one for disposing of my provision and my person; and thence it happens that you find me going onward to Rhodes, instead of returning back to Constantinople."

"And do you not fear," said I, "that the grand admiral may some day discover your exploits?" "No," replied the Candiot. "He lays his account with them beforehand. He knows he cannot furnish his hall with forty or fifty strapping fellows, stiff with gold lace, and ready to break their necks at his nod, for nothing but a miserable dish of pilaff; and like a man of sense, he suffers his Greek subjects to maintain his retinue."

A young sailor boy of the district of Spachia*—whose inhabitants consider themselves as the only descendants of the ancient Cretans, and are shepherds in their mountains half the year, and pirates at sea the other half—stood by listening to Aly's narrative. "You Spachiote scoundrels," added the tchawoosh, turning sharply upon him, "may thank your stars that your sultana is fond of your cream cheeses. From many a well-deserved avaniah does her favour save you, and your blessed malkiané.* The last gentle correction you had, I think, was in the Russian war, when the expedition from the Canea left not a soul alive in any of your villages." "Found none to kill, you mean," answered the boy. "Our men were on board the Russian vessels, and our women and children in the mountains with their flocks. This you knew, or you durst not have come."

Aly began to knit his brow. Wishing to prevent a quarrel; "who," said I, laughing, "ever wants a broken head, that can get plunder without a scratch of his little finger? For my part I always prefer marauding when the owner is from home, were it only to save the things from being knocked about."

In this sort of conversation passed away our time, until we came in sight of the island of Scyra. "What have we here?" cried I. "A town like a sugar-loaf, built on the model of a derwish's cap; with the church at the top, by way of a tuft! It must be strange enough to step from one's garret into the cellar of one's neighbour! Though I should be afraid that a walk, begun on two legs here, might end on all-fours."

"This happens the oftener," observed Aly, "as the inhabitants are by disposition stately, and fond of strutting about in long robes, in which the unevenness of their ground often makes them get entangled. Surely you must know that Scyra is the great nursery of men and maid-servants of Pera. Two sacolevas, loaded only with this article, go to the capital regularly every year; and no Scyrote returns home till he can live on his island in comfort. This comfort consists in milking their goats and grinding their barley in all the cast-off finery of their former masters and mistresses, with feathered heads and furred tails. When they meet, they treat each other with the forms and ceremonious language of people of quality. The first time I visited the island I witnessed a salutation in the street between two ladies whom I took for princesses. It begun very well, but it ended with one being rolled in the mire by a jackass, and the other riding away upon a pig, which had got entangled among the folds of her trailing drapery."

The captain of our khirlangitsch had to receive the contribution of the little islet of Serpo. On going ashore for that purpose, he proceeded straight to the hospice of an old capuchin. A sort of attraction subsisted between these two graybeards. From the heaviness of their intellects, I suppose it was only that of gravitation; for it ended in mere juxtaposition, and scarce ever was a word or idea interchanged. Still did its constancy give their mutual regard quite a romantic air. Nowhere but in the friar's dingy cell would the bey receive in state the salutation and the tribute-money of the Greek primates, whose troop presently made its appearance. All its members had their hands crossed on their stomachs, and their features composed into as demure a form as possible. The whole Greek community of the island, men, women, and children, formed the long train of the procession.

No sooner was it arrived within hearing of the captain, than the Coryphæus of the party stopped short, hemmed, coughed, and commenced his harangue. With singular aptitude of simile he compared the whiskered bey to an angel of light, and with equal consistency he besought him not to diffuse darkness over the land, by exacting a contribution which its inhabitants could not pay. The pleas for exemption consisted in a catalogue of calamities, of which pirates, floods, short crops, earthquakes, and conflagrations were the least!

"All that, gentlemen," answered the bey in his Barbaresque idiom, fetching a sentimental sigh, "no doubt very true and very miserable; but, sunset, you no put tribute here,"—and he pointed to his pouch—"me put bastinado there," added he, pointing to their backs.

At these appalling words the whole troop, epitrope and commoners, joined in a full chorus of lamentations. When they could squeeze out no more tears, they beat their breasts, and uttered the most piteous groans. Seeing all this of no avail, and the bey as obdurate as ever, they at last retired, hanging their heads, and like men led out for execution.

The sun still was above the horizon when the troop returned, with faces as dolorous as before. They only brought half the sum required, affirming, with greater oaths than ever, that if they were to be pounded in a mortar, they could not produce another farthing.

"Me believe that," said the bey, "and me therefore sorry me obliged to perform my promise. Me however begin with Signor Epitrope, in due respect for his rank. Him me not dare give less than fifty strokes. Up with his lordship's heels!" added he, turning to one of his attendants, "and begin."

All now cried out for mercy, and swore, that if but allowed five minutes more, they would try to bring the complement, were they to wrest it from the bowels of the earth.

The bey assented, and the troop again retired; but it was only to make a full stop at the first turn of the road, and there to lug out from under their cloaks the entire sum demanded, neatly tied up in bags. With this reserve they returned, and delivered it. The bey made the proper apologies to the epitrope, and the party was dismissed.

They now in a close phalanx walked slowly home, with the most dejected and miserable look; but they had not gone a hundred yards when they met some friends returning from a wedding, preceded by music. Both parties stopped, a parley ensued, and presently the whole of the procession, the epitrope the foremost, spread out their arms, and began dancing the romeika! Attracted by the sound of the instruments, the bey went to the window, and beholding the merry scene, "Mirar papas," said he to the friar in lingua franca; "mi parlar bono, canaglia senza fede piandgir; ma mi bastonar, mi far pagar, subito ballar et cantar."

Not quite so gay were my friend Aly's accompaniments, when our ship lay rocking on the waves to the music of the roaring winds. On those occasions there was any thing but grace in his movements or melody in his utterance. He had not even a pretension to heroism at sea. The slightest ruffling of its surface made him as quiet as a lamb. To his noisy, insolent tone immediately succeeded the most piteous and subdued look and manner. Aware himself how altered a man he became in rough weather, he used, at the first breeze, to slink away like the moulting peacock, and conceal himself in some hole or corner, where he lay speechless while the motion lasted. Not until the sea resumed its tranquillity did Aly reappear on the deck. How glad he was to see Rhodes need not be told. He almost plumped into the waves in his impatience to step into the boat. But even ashore, he still awhile wore a languid look, which made all the acquaintance he met ask him ironically, "with what fair one of the islands he had left in pledge his spirits?"

I ranked among those vulgar beings who take a greater interest in the living occurrences of the passing day, than in the dead letter of remote ages. As a Greek, I ever found but little motive for exultation in any research which led me to compare the present with the past. Still, I had learned—where I cannot tell—that Rhodes belonged not to the Turks from the days of the deluge: that it had once obeyed a Christian order of knighthood, of noble blood, high spirit, enthusiastic devotion, and undaunted bravery: that a handful of these valiant warriors had defended it an entire twelvemonth against the whole force of the Othoman empire; and that the Mussulmans at last only found an entrance to the citadel over the bodies of its brave defenders, fallen to the last man, in the long-contested breach.

The outside of the ancient fortress—once the chief theatre of these brilliant and bloody achievements—might be seen from every part of the quay, towering high above the modern city. Its wide ramparts, its lofty bulwarks, its crested batteries of a black rugged stone, deprived as they now were of the mighty cannon, formerly darting all round its deadly fire, looked like the silenced crater of an extinct volcano, still frowning on the fertile plain below, though its devastating power was no longer feared.

“Let us go,” said I to Aly, “and examine this object of so much strife, which Osmanlees knew how to wrest from the hands of the infidels, but know not how to preserve from the injuries of time.” “Let us go,” echoed Aly, who expected some opportunity to play the tcha-woosh: and accordingly we went.

Though now thrown open to all, the formidable enclosure still seems guarded by an invisible power. Few ever enter its precincts; and on passing its massy gates I felt struck with inexpressible awe.

Monuments that already have been so long in a state of progressive decay, as less to retain the distinct and solemn forms of art, than they resume the ruder semblance of nature; as to offer less of a former mode of existence gone by, than of a new one commencing; less of lapse into death, than of return to a different shape of life; less of dissolution, than of regeneration: as again on all sides to let in through their prostrate walls the broad glare of day; again every where to show their mouldering joints clothed in fresh vegetation, and again at every step to display their mazy precincts tenanted by the buzzing insect and the blithe chirping bird:—such monuments have their gloom irradiated by at least an equal portion of gayety; and resemble the human frame so entirely returned to its original dust, as to preserve no trace of its former lineaments, and only to break forth afresh from its kindred clay, in the shape of plants and flowers more luxuriant and more gaudy.

But edifices whose abandonment by man has been so recent that they still bear about them all the marks of death and mourning, still preserve undiminished their funeral darkness, still remain the uninvaded property of solitude and silence; that their outlines scarce are indented by the sharp tooth of time, or their surface varied by the softer weather stain; that their precincts offer not yet the smallest transition from entire unmixed death and dereliction to a new modification of life, and a new order of inhabitants; that they say in distinct terms to the beholder, "It was but yesterday we still resounded with the voices and song of numberless gay, busy tenants:"—such edifices preserve their sadness unaltered: they chill the sense, oppress the heart, and make the blood run cold; for they resemble the human body just abandoned by the vivifying soul; just stiffened into an insensible and ghastly corpse; just displaying the first awful signs of fast approaching corruption.

And of such mansions was composed the scene before me. The broad square, the stately palace, the solemn chapel, once re-echoing with the clang of arms, the bustle of trade, the boastings of youth, and the peal of devotion, looked as if the blood scarce was clotted which had stained their massy walls, and the sounds still must vibrate in air which had circulated through their lofty passages; as if one still might discern at a distance the dying voices of their departing tenants; though nothing was distinctly heard close to the ear but the plaintive murmur of the pensive turtle-dove nestling in the jagged battlements, or the measured bounds of some stone slowly detached by the hand of time from the fretted roof, and dropping with hollow din, from floor to floor, into the dark vault below.

Contemplating the great names, the sadly eventful dates, and the proud armorial bearings still shining in marble of resplendent whiteness on the broad expanse of the black honey-combed walls, like the few memorable persons and periods that still continue to soar in light among the general obscurity of times long past: thinking on the noble ancestry, the high blood, the martial character, and the monastic life of the illustrious youth—the flower of Europe—whose habitations, whose history, and whose habits these monuments so clearly marked, I experienced a new and hitherto unfelt emotion. I envied the heroes who, after a life of religion, of warfare, and of glory, slaughtered in the very breach they defended, now slept in peace and renown, leaving after them names ever young and ever flourishing in the hearts of grateful Europe. I wished that I too had been among these noble few, that I too had sprinkled these edifices with my heart's fullest tide, that I too had fallen in these ramparts, and had filled these yawning chasms with my body. In the enthusiasm of the moment I wished that I too might now be nothing more than a spirit; but a spirit entitled to haunt this august spot as the scene of my past achievements, and to say to other inferior and wondering ghosts, "Here I lived, here I died, here I immortalized my name!"

Disposed, by the comparisons which these ideas suggested, to repine at my own country, condition, and parentage, I sat down on a pillar's prostrate trunk, and there lamented the hard lot of man, who, so far from being able to adapt his circumstances to his faculties, is often, with a spirit equal to the highest station, left to linger in the lowest. In my despondency, my eye caught a piece of broken marble, gorgeously emblazoned with chivalresque insignia. But if the side which lay uppermost displayed the plumed crest of a Gothic knight, the reverse still bore the remains of a Hellenic inscription. It was a work and a record of the ancient Greeks, and had, no doubt, been brought from the opposite shore, where the ruins of Cnidus furnished the knights of Rhodes with an ample quarry for the monuments of their feudal vanity. At this sight my own national pride returned in all its force. "And does it then belong to me," cried I, trying by a sudden start to rouse the dormant energies of my mind—"to envy the borrowed greatness of Goths and Barbarians, only able in their fullest pomp to adorn themselves with the cast-off feathers of my own ancestors? Am I not a Greek? And what Grecian blood, even where remotest from the source it runs in the smallest rills, is not nobler than the base stream that flows through the veins of these children of the West, whose proudest boast is to trace their names to the obscurity of ignorance and the night of barbarism, whose oldest houses only date as of yesterday, and whose highest achievements are the exploits of savages!"

My friend Aly was not a person to sympathize with my feelings on this occasion. From his very first entrance into this abode of darkness and desolation, his mind had misgiven him. Turning as pale as if again at sea and in a storm, he cried out, "What can you be going to do among these ugly ruins? The place is too dreary even for an appointment with a goule."* All the time during which I stood considering the various objects that successively attracted my attention, he had continued most impatient to return; and when, after this, he saw me sit down composedly on the old broken pillar, there to follow up at leisure the train of my reflections, he fell into complete despair. "What can this confounded son of a Greek be muttering to himself, as if possessed," I overheard him say, "and that in a place where people should keep calling to each other with all their might, in order to frighten away evil spirits?" and after various surmises, it seemed he at last settled it in his mind that I was brewing some incantation, and going to treat him to a dance of spectres. At this idea his teeth began to chatter; he looked round for a way by which he might escape; but after several trials, all equally abortive, he at last convinced himself as well as me that he had not the courage to retrace his steps alone.

The only thing left for him to do, therefore, was to exert his utmost arts of persuasion, and prevail upon me to bear him company. Ere his fear had risen to its highest pitch, he had ventured for a moment to quit my side. He now became so pressing to show me what he had seen on that occasion, and was pleased to call the prettiest prospect imaginable, that at last I consented to follow him, merely to get rid of his importunities; but fully expecting to be shown some dunghill, or burying-ground, or other object equally extraordinary and agreeable. My surprise, therefore, was great, when, from a projecting bastion, I really beheld a most delightful view of the city's gay and busy suburbs, stretching with their gardens full of orange and date-trees, along the winding beach.

* A goule—ghost of a deceased person, such as the Mohammedans fancy to haunt burying-places, and there to hold converse with witches and sorcerers.

"There now," cried Aly, in a coaxing tone, on perceiving the bait to take, "who in his senses would stay another moment among these frightful black shells of houses—in which all the company I could find consisted of as sociable a party of vipers and of scorpions as one would wish to join—that had the faculty to go and investigate all the innumerable species of delight contained in that knot of little snow-white dwellings down below?" and hereupon he began to enumerate on his fingers such a wondrous list of all the good things of this world, which might probably be found in those habitations which he longed to investigate, that my own mouth, by degrees, watered at the catalogue; and to Aly's inexpressible satisfaction, I at last took him under my arm, and left the castle to explore the beach.

My curiosity was soon satisfied, but my newly acquired taste for travelling only received fresh excitement. From our conversation by the way, Aly had given me a longing desire to visit Egypt, to which country I had now performed more than half the distance from Constantinople; and the commander of the khirlangitsch had raised that desire to the highest pitch, by his description of the advancement which I might hope for in the land of the mamlukes. "Egypt," he observed, "always was the cradle of revolutions and the patrimony of strangers; always welcomed the wanderers who had no predilection for any particular soil, or attachment to any particular home. At present more than ever," he added, "it holds out irresistible attractions to the bold adventurer, who seeks his fortune in strife and confusion. To external appearances, indeed, the country slumbers in the profoundest peace. No one would guess, on a superficial glance, that the least convulsion threatened to disturb its tranquillity. The utmost which the two parties who divide the supreme sway thus far permit themselves is, each with a jealous eye to measure the strength and to watch the proceedings of the other. But this apparent serenity is only the calm which precedes the storm. The various elements, all preparing soon to fall asunder, and to assume new combinations, are all ready, at a moment's warning, to burst out into open defiance and hostility; uncertain when the trump of war may sound as a signal for battle. Meanwhile each party most eagerly seeks to increase the num<sup>1</sup> of its adherents by every new man of tried courage disposed to embrace its cause. Under these circumstances, a youth who, like you—Greek by birth, and Mohammedan from choice—is already beforehand half a mamluke ; and, handsome, vigorous, and warlike, still adds to his skill in martial exercises the more uncommon qualifications of expertness in languages and readiness at his pen—wields the hollow reed as ably as the heavy spear, and can execute a delicate commission as dexterously as a dangerous enterprise, is a treasure for which all must contend. He need only show himself on the spot to ensure opposite factions vying which shall, by the most brilliant offer, enlist him in their ranks.”

At this tempting picture I sighed. The bey guessed my thoughts. “I see,” said he, “what you want, and I can supply it. Suleiman, one of the most distinguished among the present rulers of Egypt, is my particular friend. The number of his mamlukes has been extremely reduced by the late destructive plague. He seeks every means to recruit his house. For this purpose his kehaya at Constantinople, knowing the number of ports and islands I should have to visit, gave me an express commission to engage for his patron whatever person I might find likely to answer his views. I have watched you during the voyage. You are resolute, sensible, and not likely to stick at trifles ; and, if you like the scheme, I shall give you the recommendations to my old friend which these qualities deserve.”

I bowed, expressed my delight at the commander’s good opinion, and accepted his offer. Elate at the idea of not only soon seeing fruitful Egypt, but, perhaps, myself making a figure in its annals, and alternately rioting in luxury and in warfare, while I lent my services in proud condescension to its rulers, I immediately sought a vessel in which to take my passage, and embarked in the first I could find.

As the coast of Rhodes receded from my view, my heart beat higher with eagerness and with hope. It seemed to me as if thus far I had only been trifling away my existence in contemptible pursuits, and in a contracted sphere. I was now, for the first time, going to take a flight worthy of the strength of my pinions. Wide views, noble prospects, vast plans of fortune and of fame, all at once, as if by the drawing of a curtain, expanded to my enraptured view.

CHAPTER XV.

THE sacoleva which carried Anastasius and his fortunes was first to touch at Castel-rosso, there to take in firewood for Alexandria. The captain seemed to have no acquaintance whatever with the coast for which we were bound; nor could any of his crew boast less ignorance; but they all agreed that Providence was great; and, in order to set the greatness of Providence in its fullest light, they always kept as close as possible to a shore set round with hidden reefs, and teeming with avowed pirates.

On the second day of our departure Castel-rosso came in sight. We were just going to double the most advanced promontory of the island, and to cast anchor for the night behind its projecting cliffs, when on our last tack there suddenly appeared ahead of us, close in with the shore, a long dark object of suspicious form, though the dusk prevented our discerning its precise nature. It lay on the water as still as a rock, but it bore all the appearance of being filled to the brim with life. In fact, it seemed to be neither more nor less than a pirate-boat of most respectable size, lying close to surprise us. At this sight our caravokeiri grew as pale as a ghost; and all the crew showed equal signs of courage. "A bad way this," cried I, "to meet danger! The pirates cannot see more of us than we do of them: let us at least try what a show of resolution may effect." And hereupon I got the swivels pointed, every pistol cracker put in requisition, our whole artillery brought upon deck, and every preparation made for a warm engagement. The moment we thought ourselves within musket-shot of the enemy I gave the signal for firing. "If the compliment produce nothing else," thought I, "it will at least make the scoundrels turn out and show their size and strength." Off went our first volley, and after it every eye; expecting immediately to see the hostile galley in the utmost bustle. On the contrary, she stirred not an inch; and so far from changing her position, deigned not even to return our salute. Half-surprised and half-piqued, we repeat our fire. It is no more noticed than the first. Still more amazed we give a third broadside. Even this makes no impression. But with the seeming shyness of the enemy, our own bravery rises. We approach near enough to be quite sure of our artillery bearing, and a fourth time discharge every gun into the hostile deck. Still she remained as motionless and silent as ever; and we continued incessantly firing, without the smallest retaliation or stir on the part of our antagonist, until, by degrees, this very impassibility of the enemy began to alarm us more even than the utmost fury of retort could have done. For we now fancied ourselves under the influence of some spell: we supposed that we beheld nothing but an unsubstantial vision: we became convinced that we were fighting only with the phantom of a ship; which presently would either vanish, and draw us with irresistible force after it into the fatal vortex, or explode with a dreadful crash, and bury us under its wide-spreading wreck. As, however, neither happened, and the vessel seemed equally little inclined to rise or to sink, we at last adopted the only plausible conjecture left us, namely, that the very few men which she contained had all been killed or disabled by our very first broadside. We therefore contented ourselves with keeping up a slack fire during the remainder of the night; proposing, as soon as the dawn appeared, to board her, in order to divide the spoil, and to remove the dead bodies.

The dawn at last did appear, though certainly much later than usual; and to our straining eyes showed in the object of the whole night's strenuous fighting—at the expense of all our powder and ball—a small rock in the sea, which from the peculiarity of its shape actually bears the name of the Galley. We agreed to say nothing about our smart engagement with it. But our modesty was, in spite of our caution, put to the blush. The whole island of Castel-rosso had been alarmed by the incessant firing; every part of the shore was lined with spectators, eager to witness the combat; and the moment we landed, all the inhabitants crowded round us, and in loud congratulations wished us joy of having silenced the enemy!

The cargo of wood being taken in, we pursued our voyage. It seemed an eternity in duration. Our crew knew no other mode of sailing than right before the wind; and the least cloud that arose made them put into the first creek they could reach, wholly heedless of the risk of splitting upon a rock, or running aground upon a shoal.

Coasting from one headland to another, we slowly crept round every cape or promontory on our way ; and there scarce exists, I believe, a single hole or nook large or small on the whole coast of Caramania which we did not successively visit. When the wind increased to what was called a fortuna, the sailors could only think of praying and lighting tapers before the Panagia, and as soon as fair weather returned, they could only dance and play upon the guitar ; nor ever thought of repairing the damage done to the ship, until reminded of it by a fresh storm. Still was the first part of our journey, compared with the latter, the flight of the swallow contrasted with the creeping of the tortoise. In the latitude of Damiate Fate seemed to have fixed us for life ; and we thought ourselves doomed never to pass the eastern outlet of the Nile, even with the assistance of some more experienced sailors whom we there got on board. Every inch the feeble breeze enabled us to advance, the strong current as regularly drove us back ; so that on our starboard tack we invariably lost all we had gained on the larboard. Day after day at sunrise we had the satisfaction to find ourselves just in the same place from whence we had parted at sunset the evening before. The fatal mouth of the stream seemed to breathe a fascination which no earthly power could overcome !

An aerial one at last flew to our assistance. It arose on the fifth day of our vain attempts, in the shape of a sciroc sufficiently strong to cope with the current. Backed by the burning blast we doubled the point of the Delta in the very teeth of the perverse tide, and thus approached the goal. Even before we could discern the sandy shore on which it stands we beheld the town of Alexandria, crowned with minarets, and encircled with date-trees.

In its quality of Grecian property, our vessel cast anchor in the new harbour ; the old being reserved for stanch Mussulman keels. Hell itself, as the bourn of a long sea-voyage, would have appeared to me a very habitable place ; Alexandria seemed heaven. In its melancholy mounds of barren sand I could only see pleasing swells, and in its dismal ruins a picturesque ruggedness. Its inhabitants, ready to assume any hue or form at will, were a sort of human chameleons ; but chameleons may afford entertainment by their constant changes. To me the contrast between the liveliness of the Alexan-drians and the solemn stupidity of the Turks seemed quite enchanting. As I went to secure my night's lodging at an okkal,* I was every instant arrested by their wit and repartee. "How pleasant it must be to reside here," said I to myself; "gay people are always so good-natured!"

The words were scarce out of my mouth, when I heard at some distance a loud and increasing clamour, which I supposed to be that of some rejoicing or festival. Presently appeared an immense crowd of people of every age and description—men, women, and children—rending the air with their shouts. In the midst of the motley assemblage advanced in a separate cluster a chosen band, trailing after them in procession, with louder howlings than the rest, the city weights and scales.

"What means this ceremony?" said I, accosting one of the actors in this novel scene. "For what purpose are these instruments travelling?"—"For the purpose of gibbeting the chief of the customs, a Syriac Christian, on the instrument of his malepractices," hastily answered the fellow, impatient at the detention.

"And has the law weighed and found him wanting?"—"How could it help doing so?" was the reply, "when we all demanded his punishment? We insisted on the shar-allah—the justice of God; and the cadee himself thought us too many not to be in the right. So we are going to execute the sentence."

Having now carried his courtesy to the utmost stretch, the man bade me adieu, for fear of further questions, and ran after his companions, who already were out of sight. For my part I contented myself with inwardly praying to Allah that I might be preserved from his justice; and particularly at Alexandria.

My apartment at the okkal being secured for the night, I went to a native of the place who followed the various trades of ship-agent, interpreter, and pilot, in order to get a conveyance the next day for Raschid.† In his youth the personage to whom I applied for assistance had served on board Marseillaise, Venetian, and Leghorn traders. He spoke with equal fluency the Turkish, the Arabic, the Greek, the Provençal, and the Lingua Franca. On entering his small abode, where he sat with open door in readiness to receive strangers, I found him gravely discussing with a Franciscan monk, over a bottle of rakie,* the relative merits of Islamism and of Popery.

"Hark ye, father," said he, speaking with such a volubility of tongue and violence of gesture, that at first I thought him in a tremendous passion, "I do not mean to pass myself off for the most squeamish of Moslemen. In my long intercourse with infidels (begging your pardon) I have been obliged occasionally to relax a little from the rigour of our practices. Sometimes, when time ran short, to mumble half a prayer instead of a whole one; and when water was scarce, to perform my ablutions to the chine only instead of to the elbows; nor did I always remember, when a good joint of meat was smoking on the table, and I sharp-set with a long fast, to inquire before I fell to, whether the beast had been stabbed with a knife or knocked down with a hatchet. But, thank God! I have never been a rank heathen—a kafr. I never, like you, believed in scores of gods, nor worshipped idols of wood and brass."

"Merciful Father," cried the friar, setting down the rakie already in contact with his lips, "nor I neither, nor any of us! How can you say such things?"

"How can I?" answered the Alexandriote, "but from having witnessed them with my own eyes! Who among you, I beg, thinks of celebrating a festival, building a mosque, addressing a prayer, vowing a present, imparting a wish, or expressing a want to any but St. Anthony of Padua, St. Francis of Assisi, St. John, St. James, St. Peter, St. Paul, St. Agnes, St. Catherine, St. Cecilia, or any other of the saints and saintesses, whose interference quite leaves Providence a cipher, and whose number exceeds that of days on which to worship them? In whose name but in that of these officious go-betweens are your oxen, and your sheep, and your poultry, and your very pigs, blessed by the priests at the church door? In whose honour but theirs do you suspend over your altars silver tokens of broken heads and hearts, of children born, and grown people mended? Can your cook so much as bake his meat but by favour of St. Lawrence: delighted, it seems, to be reminded of his own broiling on a gridiron? And as to worshipping wooden images—have I not seen whole shoals of Nazarenes leave the nicest, whitest, tidiest little madonnas which your toy-shops could produce, with flaxen wigs and flounced furbelows, at home, quite neglected, to travel perhaps five hundred leagues barefoot to some old mouldering figure, as ugly as a scarecrow and as black as a negro; which strange fancy, you will allow, could only arise from some peculiar virtue assigned to the latter, extracted as they thought by rubbing their noddle against its greasy pate."

"As to that, child," replied the friar—taking a fresh sip of his rakie, and pursing up his mouth like one who is going to give an unanswerable answer—"it is only on the score of superior resemblance. All the world knows that the Holy Virgin sat for her picture to St. Luke: and we may suppose she wishes to distinguish the originals by some peculiar mark of favour."

"Well!" exclaimed the Alexandriote, in astonishment, "if she had been my wife!"—but again checking himself, "and pray," added he, "your other saints, have they also each had his painter?"

"No doubt," replied the Franciscan; "all great personages with us sit for their portraits. I myself have sat, both as a Cupid and a friar."

The factor now got up, and fetching a little parcel which he gave to the padre, "There," said he, "are the St. Domingo beans you wanted. They are the very best I could find in the market. You may safely send them to your friends in Christendom, and be sure that, when well roasted, like St. Lawrence aforesaid, they will drink them for pure mokha, and admire how superior they are in flavour to the vile West India coffee." Upon this, he slapped the father on the back, dismissed him, and asked my business. I had made signs to him before not to break off the discussion, which I thought rather diverting.

On stating my intention to go to Raschid, he agreed for my passage on board one of the country djermes.* It was to sail early the next morning; and at the appointed time I went to secure my berth.

The boat seemed chiefly loaded with live stock; and by far the noisiest article of this description was a lot of female slaves, selected from among a ship-load lately brought for sale to Alexandria. A sharp grego-maestro, which kept blowing in our teeth all day long, and at dusk forced us to anchor before Bekier, enabled me to form some estimate of the value of this cargo. In the small place where we were all huddled pell-mell, the motion and the rolling produced by the storm afforded me every opportunity I could wish for of forming an acquaintance with such of the ladies as looked most social; nor did our innocent chit-chat suffer any interruption from the watchfulness of their keeper, who, horribly sea-sick, lay speechless in the hold, and never opened his mouth for any purpose at all calculated to interrupt our conversation. His charge, inured to the sea by the voyage of the Euxine and the Mediterranean, only laughed at his distress, and, in defiance of winds and waves, chattered away like magpies. A Tcherkassian damsel, whose large black eyes seemed quite determined not to suffer from the concealment of her other charms, chiefly attracted my attention. She rewarded my notice with her utmost confidence, and gave me the rude sketch of her rough adventures.

“One evening,” said she, “when I was in bed, and pretended to be asleep, my parents began to talk, as usual, about the trouble I gave them. My mother wished me far away. My father observed, nothing was so easy as to fulfil this wish. A Turkish merchant, who used every two or three years to come and collect slaves in our country, had arrived that very day; and assuredly it was fairer that those who had had all the expense should have the profit of me, rather than the neighbouring Tartars, who were every day carrying off some of our girls to sell to the Turks. My mother now changed her tone, and would not hear of parting with her only daughter. But my father, telling her she was always perverse, offered her an alternative between what she liked better than keeping, and what she disliked worse than losing me: a cask of brandy or a sound cudgelling. She took the spirits and gave up her child. The next day I was carried to the merchant. After a great deal of haggling, he bought, or rather accepted me, in exchange for arms, apparel, and other such things. I was stowed on board a small vessel, with a number of other slaves picked up in various parts. Most of them had been sold by their landlords in payment of rent. The ship proved so leaky that we never expected to reach Stamboul. By a miracle, however, we got there. At least, so I was told: for I never saw any thing of the place except the large ugly khan in which we were housed. Our owner here had us taught the requisites for a ready sale—the Mohammedan religion, music, and dancing. Every day customers of various descriptions used to come and cheapen some among us. The price set on me was what few could afford: but my time meanwhile passed comfortably. I had plenty to eat, heaps of fine clothes, and a looking-glass to myself. I should have been quite happy but for the dread of being bought for the grand signor, who, they say, has so many wives, he does not know what to do with them, and though as old as Methuselah, yet must have a new one every Christmas. Think of being laid on the shelf at the death of this old spindle-shanks, as useless lumber, in an ancient seraglio with tremendously high walls; there to remain for life neither single nor married! This fate I escaped. The kehaya of Yousouf-bey, of Cairo, bought me for his master, with some of my companions. We were immediately shipped off in a very comfortable vessel: hardly ever had a whipping during the whole voyage; and here we are, on the eve, thank God! of reaching our final destination. To me it promises a paradise. I wish I could say as much in favour of my companions. But, poor things! they were only, as it were, thrown into the bargain; and, I fear, will remain all their lives mere drudges."

This last piece of intelligence, though conveyed in a very low whisper, did not escape the quick ears of the damsels for whom Hamida expressed such unacceptable compassion. I thought it would have occasioned an immediate engagement. With one accord the whole party rose up from their mattresses, and, gathering round the frightened Hamida, abused her for telling such falsehoods—she! a low-bred Tcherkassian, without faith, fat, or manners—and that too of Georgians like them, who, at home, every day used to go to mass, and had as much victuals as ever they wished to eat! But Hamida's own mettle rose at the base insinuation, and facing her assailants boldly, "It signifies much truly," replied she, in an ironical tone, "from what country we come, when none of us will ever see it again; and whether we had much or little of our religion, when we have all renounced it alike! And as to our fat—which is the most material point—that must be seen to be judged of."

"Then let it," replied all the others in chorus; "and trust to us for seeing nothing!" and immediately they all fell upon poor Hamida; forcibly tore open her feridgé, and displayed her bosom. It might not answer the utmost amplitude of Asiatic ideas, but I confess, though I looked hard, I perceived no deficiency.

Even before this exhibition, the keeper of the ladies had cast sundry savage glances our way. He now contrived, sick as he was, to crawl unperceived among the busy group, and only announced his presence by unexpectedly laying about him with such energy, as not only to separate the combatants, but to send them slinking away to the furthest corner of the hold. He then laid himself down before them, and thus formed an effectual mediator for the prevention of further disputes.

No one remained on the field of battle except the spectators: namely, myself and a single female, as different from our Circassian as night is from day; an Abyssinian negro woman. Manumitted by her last master, the dusky nymph had nobody to whom she was accountable for her conversation but herself, feared not the interruptions of a keeper's lash, and seemed determined to avail herself to the full of her advantages. She began by informing me most prolixly, of all her concerns, past, present, and future. At first she told me her stars had looked but coolly upon her. She had been carried to Constantinople in winter, had suffered much from chilblains, and been married to a black eunuch. But the husband died, the chilblains healed, the summer came, and lovers began, like bees, to buzz about the black rose. "Still," continued she, "as I now was rich, I resolved again to quit the cold climate of Constantinople, and gradually to reapproach the milder temperature of Sennaar. Perhaps, thought I, in my way at Alexandria, I may chance to find among the Mawgarbees* some proper husband for my money, to make me amends for my former empty honours. Nothing, however, worthy the acceptance of the widow of Ibrahim-aga, offered; and I am now moving onwards to Cairo, where, wholly independent of your insipid whites, I am quite sure of suitably matching my own colour; unless," added she, with a significant glance, "something very tempting should offer by the way."

That this something actually had offered, and that every objection to the insipidity of whites had been overcome, I felt sufficiently sure by the lady's expressive œillades. Certain of her own approval, she did not in the least seem to trouble herself about any possible objection on my part; and her advances soon became so marked, that nothing could have saved me but the timely interposition of the Boghaz. This formidable sandbank, which muzzles the mouth of the Nile, was announced at a most critical moment: and if many have been wrecked upon it, Anastasius found in its effects the direct reverse. Immediately all coquetry ceased. Every other passion yielded to terror. The Circassians screamed, the Turks fainted, and the negress turned as pale as she was able. Even after the peril was surmounted, all thoughts of taking the citadel by storm seemed laid aside; and the siege dwindled into a mere blockade, which lasted till we got to Raschid.

The abrupt transition from the yellow aridity of Alexandria to the verdant freshness of Raschid, rising on the margin of a beautiful river, and embosomed in orange, in sycamore, and date-trees, might have given a fore-taste of Elysium. I spent a whole day in a jasmine arbour, eating bananas, and drinking the juice of the sugar-cane; and after thus having truly tasted the sweets of Raschid, re-embarked on board a maash,* destined to sail up the river, and to land us at Cairo. It resembled Noah's ark, was filled with beasts of every description, and surrounded by a universal flood. As far as the eye could reach, the waters of the Nile suffered nothing to rise above their surface but the towns and villages, looking on their artificial platforms as if floating in trays on the liquid plain. Among the strange animals which our barge conveyed across this vast watery waste, shone conspicuous from the bright yellow of his glossy skin a short bloated biped, who, on a head scarce peeping above his shoulders, wore, perfectly poised, a huge flat turban, which gave the tout-casemble the complete proportions of a toadstool; and truly, in the eyes of the other natives, this natural production seemed very much held in similar estimation with a fungus. An Osmalee of Cairo—a man of unusual information for his country, and of open pleasant manners—seeing the wonder with which I contemplated this figure, whispered me, “Coobd is the name these people give themselves, and they trace their descent from the ancient Egyptians; but they have changed the object of their worship from cats and onions to gold; and the only hieroglyphics they preserve are those which secure to them the exclusive knowledge of the size, produce, and boundaries of all the tracts of the country susceptible of cultivation. Nor is this, in their hands, a mere speculative and barren science. It secures them the stewardship of all the property of their Mohammedan masters. More conversant in arms than in arithmetic, we cannot dispense with this vermin, though it lives upon our best substance; and every Mussulman, of any rank or wealth, from the schaich-el-belled* who farms the whole territorial contributions of Egypt, to the smallest aga of a village, or subtenant of the schaich-el-belled, has his Coobtic steward or writer, whose accounts he understands just as much as the Coobd understands the language of his own prayers. He only knows that he is cheated, and has no way to help himself."

Night, meantime, had begun to cast its veil over even the nearest objects, when, on a sudden turn of the river, we all at once beheld at a distance before us the most splendid spectacle. The left bank of the Nile seemed for a considerable space in an entire blaze, and the luminous streak which edged the winding shore produced by its reflection a parallel line of light in the mirror of the stream, resembling a riband edged with fire. It ran along, glittering more brilliantly from the surrounding darkness. From the spot which it skirted issued an incessant clang of cimbals, of kettledrums, and other musical instruments; and as we approached near enough to discern in the fairy spectacle the effects of a most extensive illumination, the shouts and song of innumerable voices met the ear. The place thus distinguished was Mektoobes, famous in all seasons for its gayety, and at this particular period celebrating its patron schaich or saint, whose festival drew together the population of all the surrounding districts. For almost a mile the quay was lined with barges so closely wedged, that one might walk from deck to deck; while the interior of the town was rendered as light as day by thousands of lamps, some winding from the base to the summit of the minarets in parasitic spirals, others festooned from pinnacle to pinnacle in aerial curves, others again expanding in wreaths, in wheat-sheaves, and other fanciful forms. As we drew nearer, the eye was not more dazzled by the glare of light, than the ear was stunned by the din of instruments. At every corner of a street a different band of musicians played a different tune, in hopes of drowning all the others in its noise; and in every open space some different troop of singers, dancers, tumblers, sorcerers, or fortune-tellers exhibited their different sorts of feats, with a view to attract the spectators from all the rest. Here a string of awalis* strained their windpipes in tremulous quavers, until they grew as hoarse as the frogs in the neighbouring ditches; and there a knot of ghazies† distorted their limbs into as uncouth postures as if they had been frogs themselves; and while one portion of our passengers stood watching the tricks of a juggler, whose troop of performers consisted in a basketful of serpents, another portion sat gaping at the feats of a rival mountebank, whose chef-d'œuvre was turning water into blood, and earth into vermin. I speak not of the female charmers, who preferred for the exhibition of their fascinations the darker places, where they excelled in emptying of its last para the closest drawn purse. Of these syrens our poor Coobd might give the best account. He had been missing almost from the moment we went ashore; and no one could guess what witchery had conjured him away, until we all got back to our barge. It was there he first reappeared among us, and the first thing he did was to untie his pouch, in order to ascertain the damages it had sustained. A sequin was the utmost he rated it at; and that was just twice as much as, by his own account, the thrifty personage had ever spent on similar pastimes. What was his horror when he found that, by an art exactly contrary to that of the alchymists, the ladies, whose legerdemain tricks he had been too curiously investigating, had converted all his gold into base metal. His purse indeed, externally, preserved its full size and weight; but alas, the contents had experienced a sad transmutation! His gold was all turned into brass!

At any other period, the adventures of Mektoobes, and the misfortunes of the Coobd, would have furnished materials for conversation till we reached Cairo; but at this moment, the mind of no Egyptian born was sufficiently disengaged for such idle talk. A topic of higher, more universal, and more vital interest, engaged every thought, and dwelt on every lip; absorbed the whole mind of man, woman, and child; and was sure, whatever other subject even the most remote from it might accidentally be started, ultimately, by imperceptible steps, to regain full possession of every receptacle of thought!

This was the rise of the Nile, the phenomenon on whose measure and degree depended, throughout Egypt, the serious difference between plenty and famine; and whose increase, perceptible inch by inch, and sometimes rapid, sometimes slow, and sometimes entirely at a stand, kept, while it lasted, every eye on the stretch, and every mind in a fever.

In vain, as a stranger not yet imbued with the spirit of the universal subject, I now and then tried to turn the conversation into another channel. The slimy ducts that carried the muddy waves of the Nile to the farthest limits of the country were the only channels which my hearers had senses for. When I talked of Hassan's expedition to the Morea, a person on my right observed it must have happened the year when the river only rose fifteen cubits; when I hoped to engage the attention of the company by describing the splendours of the sultan's court, a man on my left asked whose office it was to bring him the daily intelligence of the Nile's increase; and when I extolled the beauty of our islands, some one, who till that instant had never opened his lips, sighed to think they had no rivers to rise like the Nile. I now despaired of any other general conversation, and, in order to hear the last of the ruling topic, took my Osmanlee friend aside, supplicated as a favour that he would first say all his imagination could possibly suggest concerning the Nile, and would then vouchsafe to give me a little sketch of the last political events of Egypt. This he readily undertook, and as his information on that subject may render more intelligible my own subsequent adventures in that country, I shall here transfer it to the reader—in substance more than in form—and with such additions and emendations as I subsequently derived from my own observation.

CHAPTER XVI.

"EGYPT," said (or said not) my Osmanlee, "after its conquest by Omar, first obeyed a race of Arab sovereigns called caliphs. To these succeeded, on its occupation by Selah-el-din, a race of Tartar princes denominated sultans.

"It was the early practice prevailing in every country under Tartar government, to leave the cultivation of the ground to the freeborn peasant, and to employ the prisoner taken in war and the purchased slave in domestic and personal services alone. When, however, the Tartar swarms, in their southward progress, came in contact with black and woolly-haired nations, the destination of their slaves became as changed as their colour. The more pliant and pacific negro, foreign in habits as in looks from his purchaser, was, under the name of abd or domestic slave, confined to household services, and was never kept for defence. Admitted to the highest posts in the household, he could attain no advancement in the state. The more warlike white slave, on the contrary, not unfrequently the neighbour, nay, the relation, of his master in the country whence both derived their origin, and considered more able to wield a patron's authority, and more fit to represent his person, was, under the name of mamluke, trained up to arms as well as to attendance. While in his master's house, he served him not only as a domestic but as his military guard and defender, and when manumitted, he became entitled to aspire to the highest dignities in the army and the state. The custom of raising military slaves or mamluques to eminent employments has prevailed wherever, throughout a great portion of Europe, Asia, and Africa, a Tartar dynasty has arisen. Indeed, slaves of this description were employed by Tartar sovereigns as their generals and their ministers, in preference to freemen, whether of the conquered or even of the conquering race. Torn up by the root from their native soil, strangers to that into which they were transplanted, unconnected with the body at large either of the vanquished or of the vanquishers, deriving their existence, their support, their greatness, from their master alone, raised by his will, and at his nod again reduced to their original nothingness, they appeared of all descriptions of men the least formidable to a despotic ruler. In their hands the power which an absolute monarch is obliged to delegate in all its fulness to each of his ministers, down to the last and least, seemed most exempt from the danger of being turned against its author.

“No device, however, has yet been discovered, by which a single hand can long continue to hold undivided an absolute sway over an extensive country. He who singly must resist the pressure of many, is doomed at last to fall. Thus it fared with Selah-el-din’s successors. The mamlukes, intrusted by them with the command of provinces, amended their original insulation by their subsequent leagues. They set aside their legitimate sovereign, and established a military government in a republican form. Each of the fourteen provinces of Egypt was governed by its own bey. These inferior chiefs used to assemble in council under a president called schaich-el-belled, or chief of the country. In this divan were enacted by plurality of votes the decrees for the common welfare of all, and each bey separately in his own department presided over their due execution.

“From its origin, and throughout all its later vicissitudes, this republic of beys has been perpetuated by means unexampled to the same extent in any other country, namely, by an uninterrupted importation of strange slaves, transformed by degrees into rulers of Egypt. Not that, as foreigners have sometimes imagined, the constitution of the Egyptian commonwealth prohibited natives, freemen, and actual descendants of those in power, by any positive law, from participating in the government of the country: not that any express ordination ever reserved the succession to power and the exercise of authority exclusively to strangers and to slaves. Throughout every period of the domination of the beys, instances have existed of individuals who were neither slaves nor strangers, but freeborn Mohammedan Turks, nay, sons of mamlukes and of beys, being allowed to attain the highest employments in the state. Three generations of beys shone in the family of Beloufi: at this moment, Ibrahim, our schaich-el-belled, boasts of the great destinies that await his son Marzook: and at some future day you yourself, who, as far as I know, were never bought nor sold, may, unless prevented by prior claims, become one of our beys.

“But a concurrence of circumstances has nearly effected what no law ever expressly decreed. According to our customs, the prolific period of youth is spent by the mamluke under his patron’s roof in forced singleness, and in the society of none but his fellow-soldiers. His constitution, more liable to the enervating tendency of the climate in proportion as it derives from its more bracing native atmosphere a greater natural fulness and succulence, is weakened, perhaps his very imagination receives a fatal bias, ere manumission allows him to quit his master’s house, and to enjoy the comforts of the conjugal state. No sooner indeed is he gifted with freedom than he seeks a wife, were it only to acquire in the sacredness of the harem a security for his person, and a sanctuary for his property; but even on this occasion his pride and his prejudice lead him to spurn from his embrace the women of the country, whose seasoned constitution might counteract the effects of his debilitated system, and permit him only to form an alliance with some female slave of his own nation, on whom the climate of Egypt exerts the same enervating influence. Seldom does any progeny arise from these too well-assorted marriages; or if blessed with offspring, and such as attains maturity, it is in general too degenerate in body, and too imbecile in mind, to hold and to defend the parental authority against a host of sturdier competitors: and for want of a sufficiency of natural heirs to succeed to their possessions and their power, the rulers of Egypt have, throughout every period of their history, been obliged to seek in fresh slaves imported from their own native realms, the heirs to their wealth, and the successors to their dominion.

“Among these creatures of servitude and devotees to ambition, the Abases, the Tcherkassians, and the youths of Odeshe and of Gurgistan,* are in general the most esteemed, as being the nearest in blood to their patrons, and the most eminent in corporeal endowments and warlike accomplishments. Renegadoes themselves, their masters make it a rule, more in compliance with custom than out of respect for religion, to raise no servant to any employment who is not by birth or from choice a Mohammedan. But this condition fulfilled, whatever native of any country north of Egypt is willing to owe his whole existence and advancement to his patron, may aspire to all the advantages an Egyptian grandee can bestow. The bey connects with the artificial relationship between master and slave all the reciprocal duties, nay, attaches to it all the reciprocal appellations, that belong to the natural ties of which he lives bereft; he calls his mamlukes his children, and bears them call him their father: according to the measure of their attachment, their deserts, or their favour in his eyes, he promotes them successively, while yet in bondage, to all the honourable offices in his own household, from that of simple body-guard, to that of hasnador or treasurer; and, when manumitted, to all the dignities in the state at his disposal, from that of single aga, to that of kiachef,* and bey, and schaich-el-belled. During his lifetime he marries them to whatever female relations of his own he can find; and at his death he leaves them heirs to his wealth and his offices. So much are these adoptive children considered as the natural heirs to all their patron's property, that his very wives, and sisters, and daughters devolve to them, according to the date of their creation and the eminence of their rank: and the greater number of such creatures, devoted to his service, defending his person, devouring his property, and raised by his patronage to wealth and to dignities a man in power possesses, the more the reflected lustre of these satellites that move around him, swells his own pride, increases his own importance, and extends his own sway. It is by the vast circumference of the base that beholders may in some measure estimate the altitude of the mountain's summit.

"Such is in Egypt the inertness of the native, and such the insulation of the country, encompassed on all sides by seas or by deserts, that the domination of the beys, though only continued by slaves, by renegadoes, and by strangers—by men forswearing every tie of country, of blood, of sex, and of religion, and offering every form of anarchy, civil war, and murder by steel and by poison—yet subsisted near two centuries without being wrested from the feeble hands that held it, either by an indigenous subject, or by a foreign invader.

* Kiachef—an officer commanding part of a province under a bey, though, like the title of bey, that of kiachef is often merely honorary.

"At last, however, the sway of the mamlukes received a check. In the year 923 of the Hegyra, Selim, sultan of the Turks, conquered Egypt, and rendered it a province subject to a pasha. The task of levying the yearly contribution imposed upon the land, partly to defray the internal administration, and partly to fill the conqueror's coffers, was the only office left to the beys and to the kiachefs employed by them for that purpose; and for the performance of this task the president of the beys of Upper Egypt stationed at Djirdgé, and the schaich-el-belled, or chief of the whole corps residing at Cairo, were held responsible. To enforce his edicts and to defend his conquest, Selim instituted in Egypt several odgiaks, or corps of provincial militia, of which the heads and the larger division were quartered in the citadel of Cairo, to defend the pasha, and smaller detachments were stationed at Djirdgé, in the Saïd, to execute his orders.

"Of these corps, the two principal were those of the janissaries and of the azabs. Each had its divan, or council, in which the chief, or kehaya, and the officers, or odgiaklees, discussed the interests of the corps. But this continued not long their only care. By degrees these chiefs, stationary in the country, and commanding a formidable force, began to resist the orders of a pasha, liable to constant removals, and the bearer of unsupported mandates. Assuming all the substance of power to themselves, they only left in the hands of the vizier the shadow of authority. They employed him to sanction with the sultan's name the statutes decreed in their private divans. While the pasha remained in Egypt, they kept him a close prisoner in the castle, and when they grew tired of his presence, they dismissed him at their pleasure. They treated the beys, employed by the sovereign to levy the territorial contributions, as their own subjects, in so far as to make the schaich-el-belled, on days of ceremony, hold the stirrup to the aga of the janissaries: and the subjects at large they oppressed so heavily, that the natives could only escape their rapacity by enlisting in their corps. In proportion, however, as the candidate for the privileges of the militia was wealthier, and thus exposed to greater extortions, the immunity which he more urgently sought he with more difficulty obtained. One half of his fortune was, in general, the price of his security during his life, and at his death, the other half devolved to the corps in whose lists his name was enrolled: nor if a rich individual had by some means succeeded while he lived in eluding the burthensome boon, could his good fortune while he breathed avail his heirs on his demise. In defect of a real engagement, a forged one was soon provided, and promptly acted upon; and to such an extent was carried this abuse, that no external control seemed any longer able to prevent the militia of Egypt from swallowing up the whole substance of the country: when the very excess of the evil produced the cure, and the internal weakness, disease, and torpor—effects of their unbounded voracity and repletion—again forced the odgiaklees to yield up the fruits of their usurpation. Just as, when arrived at its utmost height, you see the Nile—”

At this impending episode I took fright, put my finger on the narrator's lips, earnestly begged to have no similes, especially about the Nile, and entreated him only to continue his straight-forward narration.

He smiled, and thus proceeded. “Selim had ordained that the troops should remain in the citadels. They were neither to exercise any trade or to possess any land, lest their diffusion over the country should diminish their strength, and pacific pursuits should destroy their martial spirit; but their rapacity had caused these regulations to be disregarded. On the one hand, every peaceful artizan, however unable to wield a musket, was nominally enrolled, for the sake of his admission fee, in the militia, without doing any duty or receiving any pay; and on the other, the number of effective soldiers able to do duty and entitled to pay was every day left more defective, in order that the officers might appropriate their unclaimed stipend. Thus the disposable force of the country, in proportion as it nominally increased on the regimental lists, in reality dwindled away more rapidly in the field; and the army became a body bloated with superfluous saps, while bereft of requisite stamina and vigour. The cupidity of the odgiaklees made them by degrees retain not only all the personal property, but all the land they could grasp. By these means the members of the militia became accountable for that territorial imposition of which their corps had been destined to enforce the payment, and at the very epoch when their diminished strength made them less able to bring the beys before their tribunal, their increased territorial possessions rendered them more answerable before the tribunal of the beys. The situation of these farmers of the public revenue, which erst the soldiery had despised, they now began to respect. The distinct and opposite offices and powers intended by Selim to check each other thus became blended, the balance lost, and the state plunged into utter confusion. While formerly the odgiaklees had conferred on their creatures and dependants the dignities of beys, beys now gave to their adherents and freedmen the places of odgiaklees. No longer submitting to the confinement of their provinces, all these beys now left their kiachefs to grind their districts, and flocked to Cairo, to make the capital the scene of their cabals. The public revenue, before squandered by the odgiaklees, now became wasted by the beys; and whatever military force remained was employed not to resist but to protect their usurpation. The spider now wove its cobwebs in silence over those superb chambers which had resounded with the fierce discussions of the janissaries and azabs; and the pasha, who formerly had only feared the power of the militia, now trembled at the name of the beys. Meanwhile, the mamlukes, that indestructible plague of Egypt, that weed which amid its neglected fertility ever springs up anew, had continued to offer, as before, its unceasing renovation; and as the character of the soldier, promoted by his sovereign, sunk, that of the slave, raised by his private master, again rose in the public estimation.

“The bey who singly attained the greatest power was Aly, by birth a Georgian. Called to the office of schaich-el-belled, he not only reduced to a cipher the odgiaklees, but completely silenced his very colleagues, and reserved every dignity for his own favourite mamlukes, Mohammed, Ismail, and Hassan. Carrying his audacity so far as at last even to renounce his allegiance to the Porte, he contracted an alliance with its enemies the Russians, and sent his adoptive son Hassan to sack the city of Djedda on the Arabian coast. His tide of prosperity was stemmed by his other son, Mohammed. This mamluke, whom Aly had honoured with the hand of his own sister—sent for purposely from Gurgistan, whom he had loaded with such wealth as to confer on him the surname of Abou-dahab or the father of gold, and had endowed with such power as to enable him to make his own dependants beys, finding at last that he could rise no higher except by the fall of his benefactor, slew him in 1776.

“Every earthly blessing seemed to crown Abou-dahab’s crime. Nominated by the beys of his own creation to the dignity of schaich-el-belled, and elevated by the sultan to the post of pasha, he offered the first example in Egypt, as he did the last, of all the grandeur the country can bestow, and all the authority the Porte can give, united in the same person. . Intoxicated unto madness by these long draughts of successful ambition, his blood began to ferment, his fluids turned to poison, a raging fever struck his brain; and the conqueror whom Acre one day saw resplendent with glory she beheld the next day a mass of corruption.

“No sooner had Abou-dahab breathed his last than his mamlukes hastened back to Cairo to divide his spoil. Ibrahim, the eldest bey of his creation, obtained, with the place of schaich-el-belled, the widow of Aly. Mourad, the second in rank of the beys named by Mohammed, married his own relict. The other beys of Mohammed’s recent house, Osman, Mustapha, Suleiman, and the two Ayoobs, took, according to their rank and seniority, what else remained to be divided.

“The younger children of Mohammed’s ill-requited patron, Ismail and Hassan, who shared not in their eldest brother’s ingratitude, had, on Aly’s death, fled to upper Egypt. There they remained quiet during the short period of Abou-dahab’s reign; but gained strength by an alliance with two great Arab schaichs, those of Esneh and of Negaddi. Thus reinforced, they determined not to suffer Mohammed’s children to supersede the remaining sons of Aly himself, and marched directly to Cairo. Ibrahim, Mourad, and their party had not yet had leisure to prepare for the attack. With all their followers they passed through the citadel, situated on the utmost verge of the mount Mokhadem; gained the defiles of that range of mountains which extends along the right bank of the Nile all the way to upper Egypt, and there took that station which their antagonist had just quitted to occupy their own at Cairo.

“Ismail, received in the capital with acclamation, and immediately installed as schaich-el-belled, by a pasha, no longer of any use but to confer the investiture of that place on whosoever was strong enough to seize its prerogatives, lost no time in clearing his residence of all lurking leaven of sedition. Two old beys still existed, owned by no party in being, but supposed secretly to favour that of Ibrahim. Yet had they, when Ismail entered Cairo, remained in the capital; either prevented from quitting it by their infirmities, or relying for protection on their age. They were friends, and saw each other familiarly. But when Sogei came to pay his court, Ismail exacted, in proof of his loyalty, the head of Abderahman: and Sogei bowed submission. In the midst of the customary reminiscences which formed the conversation of men who had outlived all their contemporaries, Sogei dropped his chaplet. Abderahman stooped to pick it up, and Sogei plunged his dagger into his colleague's side. His feeble hand, however, could not give a home thrust, and Abderahman, intended to be laid prostrate for ever, rose from the blow, and struggled with his adversary. The surrounding mamlukes viewed unmoved two men, seemingly united in the closest friendship until both were grown gray with age, contend which should first bereave the other by violence of the few remaining sparks of a life almost extinct—should first draw from the other's heart the few remaining drops of a tide almost stagnant in their veins, and should first push the other into that grave on whose brink both were already tottering. This feat Sogei achieved. He then crawled back to the schaich with the head demanded; but, exhausted with the fight, fell dead in the act of presenting the prize.

"Ibrahim and Mourad remained not much longer in upper Egypt than Ismail and Hassan had done before them. With the assistance of the Arab schaichs of Farshout and of Dendera, they descended from Djirdgé, and demanded readmittance in Cairo. Ismail consented, in hopes of more effectually ending the struggle by treachery. With the concurrence of Ezedlee, the pasha, his antagonists were to be murdered in the citadel in full divan. Hassan, however, dissatisfied with the small share of power ceded him by Ismail, thought he now had the means for ever to secure the gratitude of the adverse party. He warned its leaders of the plot; and the same night Ibrahim and Mourad, with all their adherents, again evacuated Cairo. As soon as they had passed the gates, they proclaimed all reconciliation with Ismail henceforth at an end, and went back to their old post at Djirdgé. Here they fortified themselves, and determined to reduce the capital by famine. All provisions which descended the Nile were intercepted; and Ismail at last found himself obliged by the impending scarcity to collect his few troops, and to march southward, in hopes of dislodging his foes from a place fraught with such powers of annoyance. Ibrahim and Mourad awaited him in battle array under the walls of Djirdgé. Already, with forces nearly equal and a doubtful issue, had the combat begun, when Hassan, whose followers formed the chief strength of Ismail's army, with all his troops, passed over to the enemy. Ismail now became certain of defeat. The signal of retreat was sounded, and he fled back to Cairo.

"The schaich-el-belled's popularity in the capital had been annihilated by his exactions. Closely pursued, he felt his situation desperate. In haste he loaded his camels with his treasure, abandoned his honours, and crossed the desert as a fugitive. At Gaze he embarked for Stamboul, to seek assistance from the Porte.

"As Ismail went out at one gate of the city, Ibrahim and Mourad rushed in at the other. Content to resume their former station, they impeded not their enemy's flight. After reinstating themselves in all their offices, they strengthened their party and rewarded their adherents by making a considerable promotion of beys and of kiachefs.

"Hassan himself gained the least by his defection. This bey, surnamed Djeddawee from the sacking of that city, was among those unfortunate individuals who, with the greatest physical bravery, entirely want moral resolution and steadiness; by their waverings and changes forfeit the confidence of all parties, and to every faction alike appear more desirable in the character of avowed enemies, than in that of seeming friends. Whatever sacrifices he might make to the cause he espoused, they were uniformly attributed to interested motives; truth from his lips was received as falsehood; and generosity in his behaviour could only be viewed as cunning. The bare circumstance of his asserting a fact caused it to be discredited, and his being the author of a scheme sufficed for its rejection. Thus situated, he always found the thanks of his associates short of his pretensions, failed not soon to accuse his colleagues of black ingratitude, and scarce had joined a party when he afresh meditated a change. His most ordinary converse necessarily degenerated into a tissue of dissimulation and fraud, which produced no illusion; and his life became a series of intrigues and of cabals, which brought him no benefit.

"Tired of his complaints, and fearing his fickleness, the sons of Mohammed resolved to stop his reproaches by cutting short his career. The Saturday exercises in the place of Roumailli were fixed upon to execute the purpose.

"The exercise of the djereed was over. One of Mourad's mamlukes enters the lists for the game of the jar.* He advances in the circle, takes aim, fires, and misses. A second darts forward, and equally fails. A third now tries in his turn: his ball goes wider still than the former from the pretended mark; but it strikes the real one, for it grazes the turban of Djeddawee. Every bystander loudly laments the accident. The bey alone saw the intent: he saw his death-warrant signed. Immediately he calls round him his mamlukes, and from their close pressed circle raises the cry of war, and the sword of defiance. His suite all draw their sabres: so do Mohammed's children. The games cease; the fight commences: the few remaining adherents of Ismail join the banners of Hassan.

"Three entire days did every street of Cairo in turns become the field of battle. Three entire days did every stone of the capital in turns stream with blood. At last Hassan felt his strength give way, and saw his supporters fall off, one by one. On the point of being overwhelmed by his enemy's superior force, he gathers together a small troop which he still could rely upon, and breaks through the very midst of his assailants. With a speed which nothing could slacken, he gains the vast suburb of Boolak, on the Nile, and there seeks shelter in the house of an old friend—of the schaich Damanhoori. The sanctity even of that distant asylum is disregarded, and the approach invested, a few minutes after its gates had received the noble fugitive.

"For a while, however, intrenching himself behind the enclosure of his fortress, Hassan gallantly stands the siege; from every window and battlement of the edifice pours down upon Mourad's satellites every species of murderous implement, and makes many a foe atone with his life for the relentless pursuit. But after more than an hour's strenuous defence, he beholds from the top of the building the door burst open, and the entire hostile torrent rush in at once. He now resolves to quit the hopeless contest, and to save himself by flight. Mounting on the terrace of the mansion, now no longer secure, he thence clambers on the roof of a neighbouring house. From that passes on to the next, and in this manner vaults from terrace to terrace,* and climbs from roof to roof; sometimes scaling almost inaccessible heights, at others leaping down awful precipices, and at others again clearing frightful chasms: until at last he gains the furthestmost of the habitations that form a connected cluster. Here he finds his aerial progress stopped; and from the summit of this final promontory again is compelled to descend to the regions below, and to return to the level of his pursuers. From the terrace he lets himself down into the attics; from these into a lower floor; gains the top of the stairs, runs down a hundred steps, reaches the hall, and opens the entrance-door. In the very porch stood sentinel a hostile mamluke of gigantic stature, waiting his arrival to intercept his passage. Him he fells with his sabre at a single blow, and mounting the mamluke's own steed, he rides back at full speed to Cairo. But at every turn his antagonists were watching. They soon espy his escape: and in a moment he heard the whole troop again close at his heels. Danger seemed to lend him wings. He reaches Cairo the first; though scarce by the distance of a pistol-shot. Clearing the crowded entrance of the city, and pushing up the main street, he rushes, as soon as opportunity favours, into the midst of the most populous and busy district; runs up one narrow lane and down another. As he enters a new division, he causes its gates to be shut behind him, in order to delay the progress of his pursuers. Meeting a string of camels carrying water, he rends open the skins with his dagger, to increase the slippery smoothness of the pavement. Coming up with a file of Arabas, conveying a wedding, he tilts over the wagons to bar the passage. No throng of human beings, however great, stops his career. His yatagan cuts its way through the thickest cluster of passengers. Overthrowing some, trampling others under foot, he still advances unslackened in his speed. Every where warning shouts announce his approach; every where screams of terror precede his rapid steps. At sight of him the horror-struck mob flies in every direction like chaff before the hurricane: and his wide circuit frequently bringing him back to the same places he had appeared in before—but each time more pale and ghastly and covered with blood than before—he at last begins to be viewed as his own ghost, still continuing the flight of the body. It was a stupendous thing to behold a vast capital, successively filled throughout each of its numerous quarters, from one end to the other, with ever increasing terror and dismay by the appearance of a single man, and that man himself a fugitive, only darting by like a meteor—just heard, just seen, and then again disappearing.

“Hassan’s strength now begins to fail him, His horse is ready to drop. His pursuers, who for a while had lost his track—guided by the clamour of the mob at his appearance—again recover the scent. They gain ground upon him so fast, nothing seems capable any longer of saving him from becoming their victim.

“He now bethinks himself of one last desperate expedient. The house of his most inveterate enemy—of Ibrahim, the schai-ch-el-belled—had just risen in sight. He springs from his exhausted steed, no longer able to move, and summoning all his remaining strength, runs to this perilous abode, and gains with difficulty its portal. Entering the frowning gates, he forces his way athwart the bevy of astonished pages, who in vain try to stop the intruder, and makes straight for the holy of holies, for the women’s apartment. Pushing away right and left the eunuchs, the slaves, and the guards stationed to defend the entrance of the gynæceum, he bursts open the prohibited door, advances through the labyrinth of narrow passages, and at last, after many wanderings, reaches the very centre of the awful sanctuary.

“Here, totally exhausted, and faint with fatigue and loss of blood from many a wound inflicted by a distant carbine, Djeddawee at last stops, lays down on the rich carpet his naked ensanguined sword; and viewing before him that mightiest of her sex, the sister of Aly, the widow of Mohammed, and the wife of Ibrahim—risen from her seat in mute astonishment—he throws himself prostrate at her feet, clasps the hem of her embroidered garment, and implores her all-powerful protection.

“What could Ashtar do? when a son of her brother, and a brother of her first husband, humbled to the dust, implored her to save his life!

"She swore to protect him while he remained in her sight; and in her presence none durst lift his hand against the supplicant. Even Ibrahim her husband consented to respect his hated existence, until he again should go forth from the shadow of his roof.

"But Mourad appears! Furious from his numerous disappointments, and Hassan's hair-breadth escapes, he demands possession of his victim, or threatens to abandon his party. The schaich-el-belled wavers, and at last consents to cast a stain upon his character, in order to satisfy his colleague. In defiance of the laws of hospitality, he insists on Hassan's quitting his habitation, content to receive a safeguard to the frontiers of Egypt. The bey was not in a condition to decline the specious offer. Accompanied by a numerous escort, he takes leave and departs. But what is his new dismay, when he learns on the road that his destination is the very town in Arabia once the scene of his devastations! To turn him adrift among the injured populace of Djedda was to devote him to a death more cruel than the fate he had fled from. On the least resistance, however, to the mandate of his enemies, he was to be killed on the spot. He therefore feigned acquiescence, and suffered himself quietly to be conveyed to Suez, and there to be embarked for the harbour of Meccah. At sea he might by surprise have slain a few of his conductors, but in so rash an attempt he must soon have been overpowered by the rest. He devised a better plan. In the darkness of the night he fell upon the reïs himself, the moment sleep closed his eyelids; and with his arm round the pilot's throat and his pistol to his heart, he forced him to steer for the African coast, and for the port of Cossier. There, under favour of a mob whom the cry of a son of Aly soon collected round the boat ready for his defence, he disembarked, by forced marches gained Akmim, and from that place plunged into the desert. In a few days he reached the tents of his former Arab allies. Under their wing he took shelter: the fame of his wonderful escape spread in all directions:—at last it reached Cairo, and the wreck of his party remaining in that capital insensibly withdrew, and joined its imperishable leader.

"Ismail, on his arrival at Constantinople, had found the Porte too deeply engaged in war with Austria to involve itself in fresh hostilities with Egypt. Tired of consuming his time in fruitless expectation, and his wealth in unproductive bribes, he at last reembarked, landed at Derné, and through the oasis of Sewa, rejoined Hassan near the cataracts. Either chief had gained too little by deserting the other not to meet his former rival half-way. Common disappointment for this time riveted the union of the beys. They agreed to assign to oblivion the past, and for the future never more to abandon each other.

"Thus far," added my Osmanlee, "the engagement has remained inviolate. Three years and more the sturdy veterans have continued to live together in undisturbed possession of Es-souan, the farthest place in the Saïd on this side the falls. Too weak to molest the chiefs at Cairo, and too near the confines of Nubia to fear their molestation, they are watched, but are left quiet. All the land on either side the river, their small district excepted, obeys Ibrahim and Mourad. These chiefs reign uncontrolled at Cairo, and heavy is the yoke which they impose upon the provinces. But it bears alike on every one, and therefore appears less galling than the partial miseries of civil war. People pray for an oppression which prevents their being torn limb from limb, in the strife of contending parties."

Here ended the long narration of my Caïreen friend; or rather here end the events he undertook to relate. Almost the same moment concluded his recital and our voyage. Already rose in sight the vast pyramids to the right, and the castle of Cairo on our left. Each passenger began to collect his parcels: and scarce half an hour more elapsed, ere we cast anchor at Boolak, and stepped ashore. Our little party broke up, and every one of its members went his different way. My new friend and myself walked on together to Cairo.

CHAPTER XVII.

FROM the brilliant descriptions given me of the celebrated Masr,* of the kalish† that runs through its centre, and of the birkets‡ that adorn its outskirts, I expected, if * Masr—Cairo.

† Kalish—canal or cut, communicating with the Nile. That which runs through Cairo, and feeds its different birkets or lakes, is opened every year with great solemnity, when the Nile has attained the requisite height.

not an earthly, at least an aquatic paradise. On first reaching this vaunted city, I saw nothing but filth and ruins on the outside, and filth and misery within. "So much!" exclaimed I, thinking of Aly 'Tshawoosh, "for travellers' tales!"

"So too, said I," echoed my companion the Caïreen, somewhat nettled, "on entering Stamboul!" "What!" cried I, in my turn, "would you compare Cairo with Constantinople? Where can you find the least resemblance? Is it between the vile swamps that here extend to the banks of the river, and the verdant hills which there rise from the very margin of the sea? between the yellow muddy stream here treasured up for refreshment in half-baked pitchers, and the crystal rills there gushing forth from golden fountains? or, finally, between the smoke-dried men, tatooed women, and blear-eyed, bloated children of this overgrown beggarly place, and our population of patriarchs, of houris, and of cherubs? In Constantinople the very cemeteries of the dead look like portions of elysium; here the habitations of the living already seem charnel-houses."

"With us each gem has its foil," observed dryly my friend; "and we admire our beauties the more from the relief which that very circumstance gives them. Suspend your judgment on our comforts till you see the palaces of our beys."

This was not to be my destiny immediately. I had observed the hanglity looks and gorgeous apparel of the meanest of the mamlukes who condescended to mix among the populace; and wished to avoid the privileged caste, until I might vie in my appearance at least with its minor members. I therefore was content to sleep the first night at a khan; and the next morning prepared for presenting my letters. Keeping my friend Aly before my eyes as my model, I put on my gayest attire; and when fully equipped for my visit, viewed myself in a looking-glass with such complacency, that I began at last to apprehend the fate of Narcissus; and for fear of catching the evil eye from myself, tried to spit in my own face:* deeming an extraordinary case to require an extraordinary remedy.

This exploit performed—not without some labour—I sallied forth, feeling quite secure as to what might happen.

* Tried to spit in my own face—see page 149, note.

A fellow in the street, himself totally blind, showed me the way to Suleiman's palace, on the lake Yusbekieh.* The grandeur of its portal, far from damping my confidence, rather elevated my pride, by promising a theatre worthy of my ambition. Bounding like a ball, I ascended its spacious stairs, paced the long gallery, and entered the hall of audience. Perceiving the bey, seated in the angle of his sofa at the upper end of the room, I boldly advanced—retorting the supercilious and scrutinizing looks of the gay youths who lined the passage—and when near their patron, put my hand to the ground, to my forehead, and my lips, and presented my credentials with every possible grace.

Throughout the East, grantees, when first addressed, preserve an impenetrable countenance. Their internal emotions lie concealed under a mask of iron. Thus they avoid committing themselves, as they must in some measure do, were they even to express the reverse of what they feel. Still I fancied I could discern athwart the bey's immoveable features, such an impression, produced by my first address, as I had no reason to repine at. Once or twice, while one of his eyes affected most diligently to run over the recommendatory lines, I caught the other straying from the paper, and stealing a sly survey of my person, with an air of most encouraging approbation. Having at last—apparently with great toil—completed the perusal of the long epistle, Suleiman laid it by him on the sofa, wiped his face, and bade me welcome. "My friend Othman-bey," said he, moving his little hands in unison with his speech, "describes you as possessed of valuable talents, and I feel anxious to acquire a claim to your services. Unfortunately," added he, in a lower tone, after beckoning to his attendants to retire out of hearing, "our mamlukes, with all their excellent qualities, are somewhat addicted to idleness, to deceit, and to treachery, and are extremely jealous of all whom they look upon as intruders: nor dare we openly brave these little weaknesses, or confer on a stranger what these our adopted children consider as their rightful honours. Indeed, the stranger himself would soon have cause to rue the unavailing favour. I therefore do not immediately give you in my house a definite office. But stay as a guest, a friend, a household counsellor; and in time the thing may be managed. God be praised, you are not at least a Turk! Like us you are an Islamite from choice."

After this little preamble, the bey proceeded to try me on the nature and extent of my acquirements; and as he was not sorry that his mamlukes should have an opportunity of witnessing his own vast erudition, he made signs to them to return within hearing distance during the examination. An Italian missionary had once given him a dictionary, as a book replete with short and pithy stories; and in its sedulous perusal the bey had contrived to pick up a considerable assortment of technical terms of art and science, which he employed as it pleased Providence. Of the things themselves, whose appellations he had learned, he seemed to have no more idea than the huge Angora cat which sat purring by his side; and an elementary chaos of astronomy, tactics, geography, mythology, and medicine, all huddled together at random in his brain, flowed in most picturesque confusion from his lips. Extensive, therefore, as certainly was the general outline of his attainments, it still left me room to fill up a few intervening blanks, in such a way as to give a very favourable opinion of my own knowledge; without, however, presuming so far on its superiority as to inform his highness point-blank that England, for instance, lay not contiguous to India—as he had imagined from their constant warfare; or that Voltaire had never been pope of Rome—as he had inferred from the frequent juxtapositions of these personages in his missionary's anecdotes. With all this forbearance, however, my course of practical education at the arsenal, joined to the speculative topics I had heard discussed at Pera, still enabled me to pass myself off in the meridian of Cairo for a youth of no common accomplishments; and at every answer I gave to Suleiman's subtle queries, he failed not to assume a profound look, and after some little apparent meditation, to exclaim, in an emphatic tone, "Good, very good, excellent, admirable! In time you will know as much as I do!" The only thing which seemed to give a little offence was my affirming peremptorily that the earth revolved round the sun, and not the sun round the earth. At this bold assertion, so contrary to my usual caution, the bey looked as if he suspected me of a design to play upon his credulity; and I could only get out of the difficulty, in which my pride of learning had led me, by assuring him that it was among us a very common belief; which he still kept wondering that so sensible a fellow as I seemed should have adopted.

When satisfied with the exalted idea which he doubted not he had given me of his own proficiency in learned and foreign lore, Suleiman by degrees descended to more familiar topics; and I now was surprised in my turn to find a man so utterly ignorant in matters of general information, at the same time so much at home in all that concerned the immediate interests of his country and station. But, like many other people, the bey prized his knowledge in proportion to its rarity, and seemed to value most that of which he possessed the least. He threw out all his questions about the politics of the Porte in so careless a manner, and seemed so little to heed my answers, that an indifferent bystander would have sworn the most vital subjects to Suleiman were just those which he cared least about. He at last concluded his long string of queries with the affairs of Christendom. "You have been long at Stamboul," was his prefatory sentence: "and therefore cannot fail to know all about Franguestan.* What bone, pray, are those Christian dogs now contending for? Do they think they possess enough upon the earth? Or are they planning some expedition to the moon? Blind as they are, poor creatures! they seem not less busy than those that can see! And out of mere curiosity, one would sometimes like to know what is passing in a mole-hill."

Book-learning might afford a pretty pastime; but with a race like the mamlukes, whose chiefs as well as meanest individuals were always required to be on the alert, and ready alike for attack, for defence, and for retreat, skill in the exercise of the carbine, the pistol, and the sabre were the essential and indispensable qualifications of every candidate for preferment. In respect of these military accomplishments also, Othman-bey had in his letter mentioned me with praise; but I clearly saw Suleiman took it for granted that the same human being could not possess talents so opposite and so varied. When, therefore, I begged permission to join the next day in the martial sports of his mamlukes, he strongly tried to dissuade me, lest I should only expose myself: but my perseverance conquered. He at last consented, though evidently concerned at my obstinacy, and pitying my rashness. Not so his young mamlukes! They were delighted with anticipations of the sorry figure I should make among their expert and dashing troop; and significant glances circulated round every part of the room. The morrow was to be a day of merriment.

At the appointed hour on that morrow I went to the bey's palace, and found the whole household assembled in the courtyard, ready to sally forth. We soon marched out in grand procession; but when I inquired whither we were going, not a creature knew. The beys are too fearful to trust their followers with so important a secret. Not until the whole party is turned adrift in the fields does the serrah, or domestic charged with the camp apparatus, receive intelligence of the destined halting place. Off he then sets, on his dromedary, to make his preparations: the rest follow with loud clamour; and when the place of destination is reached, the mamlukes immediately dispose themselves in a spacious ring round the ground.

The Koobbet-el-haue proved to be the spot selected. And I suspected the bey of a secret wish to verify his forebodings, when I understood it to be the most trying ground for martial exercises in the neighbourhood of Cairo! In order to judge how it lay, to study the mode of play of the mamlukes, and to form some estimate of their strength, I at first hung back, as if not daring to join in the sports: but, of course, the less alacrity I showed, the more I was pressed to expose myself. The youngsters knew, they said, it was in sheer compassion upon their inferiority that I did not choose to come forward. But my backwardness would not serve me: I stood engaged, and my modesty must be put to the blush.

As if only reluctantly urged on by these repeated jokes, I at last, in seeming trepidation, snatched up a djereed; and in order to render my incapacity the more palpable, the most indifferent performer of the set was pitted against me. Off went my adversary's staff! Spite of my indifferent steed, I avoided the blow, and the harmless stick only raised a cloud of dust. All wondered at my escape. In my turn I flung the wooden weapon, but not with similar effect. It reached its destination, and most unequivocally delivered its errand. The astonishment of the spectators redoubled, and my antagonist limped in rage out of the circle. The rest of his companions now began to suspect that it was not a tyro's task to contend with the new comer. The more skilful players took their turn. They had little better success; and the first exclamations of surprise gradually subsided in speechless disappointment and dismay. Every voice was hushed, and every lip bleeding with bites of vexation.

I had the good fortune to show equal dexterity in the use of the pistol and the sabre. The jar flew in pieces, and the felt* was cut through and through. In the Koobbet-el-haue at Cairo I thus first reaped the fruits of the exercises performed in the Ocmeidan of Constantinople, and the melancholy that produced the exploits in the one led to the triumph that resulted from the feats in the other. So high in an instant rose my reputation, that the bey himself proposed to try his hand against me. I had heard him described as an indifferent performer. I could have no doubt that, equal to Suleiman's ablest mamluks, I had little to fear from their master. Yet did every person present seem to revive at the bare proposal of the match. "How is this?" thought I: but a moment's thought gave me the clew to the phenomenon. "Ah, rogues," I inwardly exclaimed: "to see me victorious is now precisely what you wish for, in order that I may irretrievably lose the favour of the bey. But take leave of your hopes! Selim not only knows when to play well, but also when to play ill;" and in fact, I took such uncommon pains for this prudent purpose, that on quitting the field, Suleiman pronounced me by far the best player next to himself he knew in Cairo, and the one he liked most to engage with; and, on returning home, definitively took me into his service. Fearful, however, of putting me at once on the footing of the favoured caste, he placed me for the present among his scratches.† My salary was trifling; but who among the followers of the beys of Egypt depended upon his wages for his emolument?

Suleiman possessed, in addition to the numerous mamluke sprigs ingrafted upon the family tree, one male and sundry female suckers, directly sprung from the stock. To his female offspring Suleiman seemed attached: the male shoot no one could accuse him of spoiling by excess of fondness. He considered the Bey-Zadé as a perfect cipher. Seldom he deigned to inquire after his health : never to demand his presence. "What interest," would he say, "can I take in a plant on which all culture is thrown away? Why cherish a reed too feeble to support my increasing age? What I lay out on a conceited idiot, who forgets his deficiencies only to remember his birth, I lay out to utter loss. I even expend it without reaping empty thanks! Are not then my gifts more wisely bestowed on men whom I cherish for their intrinsic merit, and who reward me with their gratitude?" To this mode of reasoning I, for one, could not possibly object.

Various were the sorts of merit which, in the eyes of my patron, took precedence of kindred. Valour, capacity, zeal, each obtained their share of superior esteem: but the quality rated above all others was a pair of ruddy cheeks. Among many other instances of their paramount influence, a young fellow from Odesché, remarkable for his stupidity and peevishness, had just superseded in the bey's favour, and in the place of tchibookdjee,* a Georgian esteemed for his good qualities by all his companions; and that, for no other earthly reason which any one could discover, except that his face looked like a ripe October peach. Suleiman himself saw nothing singular in this fancy. "People," he said, "value a tulip, a shawl, a ruby, a canary-bird, a horse, for the brightness of their hue: they dress up their domestics in the gaudiest colours! Why then should they not be as particular about their faces? and choose their attendants by the same rule as their flower-pots; since both alike are destined to furnish their chamber! For my part, it is my delight, when I cast my eyes around, to view a long row of handsome busts; and I think I may be permitted to be as fastidious about the hue of my pages, as my neighbour Ayooob is about that of his pipe-sticks!"

Fortunately, the new comer possessed not in his complexion wherewithal to make any very valuable addition to Suleiman's collection, as it must have kept me at home much oftener than I liked, for fear of spoiling the set. So far from mine being any longer pure and primitive colours, they were rather become neutral tints, and such as could not, by their absence, leave the smallest sensible gap in the bey's prismatic scale. Scarce a day therefore passed without my allowing myself—in company with some of the younger mamlukes of our house—time to visit Maallim* Ibrahim, Maallim Yacoob, Maallim Yoosef, or some other of the maallims, or writers of the Coobtic persuasion, who lived round the Yusbekieh. They assisted us in keeping up some of our good old Christian customs; for they never would let us depart without reviving our spirits with a few glasses of rakie: “in order,” they said, “to keep out of our stomachs all the water that surrounded us.” This good purpose, however, they sometimes overshot; for one evening my companion and myself took so copious a dose of the antidote, that on returning home we no longer could distinguish the path from the canal that ran alongside of it; and so fell into the ditch, which was full to the brink. My companion first pulled me in, and I afterward pulled him out; and he felt so thankful for this trifling compliment, that from that moment we became sworn friends. Some of the other mamlukes, indeed, wished to sow the seed of discord between us; but in vain they tried to damp the ardour of an attachment begun in a ditch.

Rashooan was my comrade’s name: Gurgistan his country. He possessed in an eminent degree all the qualities in which mamlukes excel. Equally active and vigorous, he could break the most unruly horse; leaped a ditch (when sober) with the agility of a deer; brought his steed to a dead stand in the midst of the swiftest race; and wielded with equal dexterity the scimitar, the musket, and the pistol.

One day I found him describing in glowing terms to a knot of his companions the glories of his native soil. Its flowers, fruits, verdure, streams, men, women, and even, I think, tobacco-stoppers, were, according to his account, positively of a different nature from those of every other country; and could he but once more behold this land of wonders, he would resign his breath contented! “I did not know, Rashooan,” said I, when the party separated, “that you so grievously regretted your native country.” “Nor I neither,” was his answer; “and, between ourselves, I pray to God every morning that I may never see it again. Fine horses, rich caparisons, costly armour, sumptuous apparel, Egyptian grooms, and negro slaves, would be a sad exchange for a life of hard labour and poverty ; and for what purpose ? Only to find myself forgotten by my parents, and recognised by nobody but a landlord who would sell me again ! I have lost my relish for simplicity, and am weaned from my mother nature. But it is not amiss, now and then, to remind these pert coxcombs that they are only savages, and that I am a Georgian."

Scarce had Rashooan uttered these words when two or three of Suleiman's younger mamlukes came running to us, and, addressing my friend, said, " Either something very good or very bad is hanging over you. We have left Othman-kiachef closeted with the bey, and you are the theme of their discourse. Both repeated your name frequently with considerable vehemence." " Ah !" answered Rashooan, " if any thing extraordinary awaits me, it is sure to be bad. I never was fortunate myself ; nor ever brought good fortune to others ! When a boy I was sent among the Kabardahs. Kind people ! My host adopted me as his child ; his wife sealed the act with the milk from her own breast ; and his sons swore to treat me as a brother. What was the consequence ? Tartars carried me off, my adopted kinsman fell in my defence, and I was sold to the Turks. I now am a slave by habit as well as from necessity, and no longer wish to be free : the chance therefore is, that I am doomed to have my liberty."

Other mamlukes now brought Rashooan word that his presence was commanded. Sighing, he went, and in about half an hour returned to us with a countenance clouded by sadness ; " Selim," said he, " I leave you : for ever I must leave the house of Suleiman."

" What motive," cried I, " can induce the bey to part with a favourite ?"

" Listen," answered Rashooan. " Othman-kiachef had an elder brother in Georgia, settled at a distant place. The kiachef has just discovered that I am that brother's son. He has consequently requested of Suleiman to purchase me. But, as you may suppose, our patron did not think himself warranted by any circumstance, however singular, to listen to the proposal. " Such a disgrace," cried he, " as that of bartering my mamluke for money shall lie neither on his head nor on mine. Suleiman may inflict death on an undutiful son, but his enemies shall never say, ' he exchanged him for gold !'"

" Othman upon this looked exceedingly dejected, and Suleiman for awhile seemed rather to enjoy his distress. At last he proceeded thus: 'Since, however, Rashooan is your nephew, God forbid I should keep him from his uncle's longing arms. Receive the young man as my gift, and let the donor ever remain near your heart.'

"Othman," pursued the Georgian, "would fain have excused himself from accepting me in the burthensome form of a present; but unable to obtain his nephew on any other terms, he submits. I therefore leave you; I leave all that is dear to me! Torn in my childhood from my natural friends, I now in my youth am wrested from all my adoptive brethren. But the will of God be done!"

We accompanied Rashooan back to the palace, where he took an affectionate leave of his patron and his friends. All regretted the young mamluke sincerely; and Suleiman himself appeared greatly moved. Little did he foresee what luck his gift one day would bring him!

The removal of Rashooan left me fewer inducements for rambling, and this was fortunate; for every day the bey could less endure my absence. I was his cyclopædia; and whatever puzzled his sagacious brain—whether a paragraph on Egypt in an old Vienna gazette, or the site of Cairo in a worn-out Nurnberg map; whether the arranging of a microscope presented by a traveller, or the telling of the weather by a barometer extorted from a Jew; whether the construction of a barge, or the design of a keoschk—all was referred to me, as to the oracle-in-chief: so that many a time, when there occurred what seemed inexplicable riddles to mamluke intellects, I could only escape my part of Œdipus, by my insufficient proficiency in the language of the Egyptian sphinx; and my ignorance of the Arabic saved my credit for information on many other subjects. The bey, however, recommended me to the tuition of a schaich, bred in the college of El-azhar;* not doubting, that, when once taught all the refinements of the Caïreen idiom, I should no longer be at a loss for an answer on any topic whatsoever. He thought me a positive abyss of science; and, in truth, it would have been difficult to discover on what bottomed my knowledge. Whenever I feared that its want of solid foundation might become palpable, I diverted the bey's attention by some piece of flattery. Not that I ever condescended to perform so inferior an office in the endless departments of adulation, as that of administering to Suleiman his daily dose of crude, unmodified incense, which, in common with all other grandees, he had, from long and inveterate habit, come to regard—like his daily pill of opium—as an absolute necessary to his constitution; insomuch, that while he could as little dispense with the praise as with the laudanum, he swallowed both alike only as a thing of course, and felt neither peculiar exhilaration from the drug nor gratitude towards the giver:—the task of preparing this insipid sort of panegyric I left to the vulgar herd of attendants. Mine was the nicer office of exciting the bey's appetite ere I gratified it, and of heightening the flavour of the destined draught by that little previous fermentation which I often had found to give spirit to the flattest beverage. I therefore usually began by putting my patron, through means of some point-blank contradiction, into a violent rage. To yield afterward to the force and perspicuity of his arguments was perfectly irresistible: it gave at once the pleasure of surprise to his triumph, and the appearance of sincerity to my submission!

Such pains to please deserved a recompense, and they obtained it, but in mode nearly as circuitous as that in which the reward had been earned. Seldom was Suleiman known to bestow a direct gift: what he usually granted to his favourites was an opportunity of grinding other favourites already provided for—and of laying under contribution some dependant or client. He would send me, for instance, to inform some rich Jew protegee that he had been thinking of him all day, or some wealthy Christian tradesman that he had been dreaming of him all night; and truly I had never before experienced such a solid way of thinking, or such golden dreams! As an additional favour, he introduced me to all his most distinguished colleagues; particularly to Ibrahim-bey Sozeir, to Moustapha-bey Skanderani, and to Ayooob-bey the great. This latter was pleased to express great regret that his ill fate should not on my outset have directed me to himself.

On first entering Suleiman's house I had found the envy of his mamlukes entirely centered in the tchibbook-djee. It was hard to digest so marked a preference shown a native of Odesché, whatever might be the colour of his cheeks. But when I, who was not even a purchased slave, became the bey's right-hand, only for practising a few foreign juggling tricks, as they were politely termed, even the favourite was thought aggrieved, and began to be pitied. Accustomed to dissimulation, he however preserved with me an exterior of civility, tempered only by a few cutting remarks, so expressed as to seem to arise from sheer kindness; until a favourable opportunity at last offered of letting loose upon me all his malice.

Suleiman had been rather too eager one day in exhibiting his prowess at the djereed. Overheated with an exercise too violent for his age, he returned home greatly indisposed. His illness soon became so violent a fever that his life was thought in danger; and his hakem in ordinary, at his wits' ends, no longer knew what to do. All his mamluks stood aghast round their patron, expecting every hour to be his last. I was looking on with the rest, when all at once it occurred to me that I need not remain an idle spectator. Eugenius, my French instructor at Pera, whose strong mind lodged in but a weakly sort of a body, had on occasions derived relief from an English powder, which he always kept with him. Of this panacea he had at parting given me a few papers, as a valuable present. But Anastasius in health never remembered that Anastasius might fall ill, and the medicine was abandoned to whoever chose to try its efficacy: an occurrence the more frequent, as the result of the experiment always was favourable. It however now struck me that, possibly, among my clothes, there might be some powders left which might save the bey's life and make my own fortune.

Full of this idea, I broke through the circle, burst out of the room, and ran, with a throbbing heart to my own chamber to look for the medicine. But where to find it I knew not! Every corner of my box was ransacked, every hole of my room was searched, every article of my apparel was turned over fifty times, without my being able to discover the least symptom of the tiny blue papers for which I was hunting. At last I gave over the search, considered the case as hopeless, and went downstairs again, to resume my forlorn station in the sick chamber, where even during my short absence matters were grown worse. Scarce had I entered, than I recollected that in tumbling over my wardrobe I had perceived the blade of an old rusty handjar—a keepsake from Aly—stick out of the sheath, and had met with some resist-nce on trying to push it home. In the flurry of my spirits, I had only cursed the rusty weapon; but, on recurring to the circumstance, a glimpse of hope flashed upon me. Aly had taken one of my powders after his seasickness, and the handjar had been his acknowledgment for the relief obtained. I ran back to my chamber, probed the scabbard to the bottom, and from the very point of the implement of death drew forth the last dose of my restorative of life and health—probably thrust there in some thoughtless moment. Wrapping up the precious medicine in an embroidered handkerchief, I ran down again to the bey; gave him—for fear the simple truth should sound too homely in his ears—a pompous account of the singular personage to whom I owed the gift; expatiated on the incalculable rarity and wonderful powers of the medicine itself; and ended by imploring him to take perhaps the last dose of this powder of life existing on the whole terraqueous globe!

Most ready was my patron to try its efficacy; but I had seen him swallow other medicine of less vital importance with an ill grace, and spit out three goodquarters and a half. Fearful lest he should serve in the same manner what I considered his sole remaining chance of existence, I went for some palatable vehicle in which to secure a safe transit to the powder.

Though scarcely absent two minutes, I found on my return the face of affairs entirely changed! The tchibookdjee had employed the short period of my absence to insinuate that the medicine probably was a poison, and the giver a rogue. Of late, I had been much with Ayoob-bey. Ayoob, indeed, was Suleiman's most intimate friend! But what were mamluke friendships? And my evident confusion, my wildness, and my running in and out, clearly bespoke a guilty mind. When full of exultation and hope I offered the draught, the bey pushed it aside, and without giving any reason, said he would take no more physic! The declaration seemed a death-blow to myself: but, suspecting whence it proceeded, I steadfastly cast my eye round the mamluke circle. The tchibookdjee looked away; I guessed the truth, and trembled.

It now became necessary to ensure my own safety. I therefore said with firmness, "This powder has some other virtues besides that of expelling fever: it exposes calumny. Since my patron rejects its healing powers, let it at least bear witness to his Selim's heart ; and may God forgive the unfaithful servant who suffers the waste of what might have saved his master's life !”

Saying this, I carried the cup to my lips. My speech had restored to the bey his former confidence. With all the eagerness which his debility permitted, he interposed his trembling hand between the rim and my mouth, wrested from me the draught, and whispering to the tchibookdjee in a faltering accent, “he cannot be a poisoner,” at one gulp poured down his throat the whole contents.

In my eagerness to do good I certainly had not sufficiently proportioned the dose to the weakness of the patient. Instead of finding relief, he felt greater oppression : and soon his constitution appeared utterly unable to struggle with the medicine. The mamlukes, upon this, renewed all their former surmises, and spoke their sentiments so loudly in the bey's hearing, that they seemed quite determined to justify their imputations, cost what it might ! and in default of real poison, to kill their patron through the fear of it. I was in a trance. Had I dared, I should have mounted my horse and rode away, without waiting the issue. But I saw myself watched on all sides, and I knew that on the smallest attempt to make my escape, I must be cut down on the spot. Meantime a deathlike paleness overspread the bey's countenance : his features became fixed, and his breath ceased to be perceptible. This was the critical moment. I gazed on his countenance, like one whose own life depended on its changes. At last a slight dew broke out upon his forehead ! The powers of the medicine triumphed : plentiful retchings and evacuations, which soon followed, enabled the system to throw off the weight which oppressed it, and the fever abated ! From that instant the bey's illness took a favourable turn. Every hour showed an improvement on the preceding ; and in a short time after being to all appearance in the agony of death, Suleiman was on his legs again, as well as ever ; while, as had been predicted at the Fanar, I fell upon mine at last, and stood proclaimed the saviour of his life

CHAPTER XVIII.

On the occasion of his recovery, Suleiman took a less circuitous mode than usual of showing his gratitude. He made me at once, by a direct grant, multezim or proprietor of a district containing several villages; and Selim-aga thus became a man of substance. But this favour inflamed to such a degree the jealousy and murmurings of the mamlukes, that the bey, I believe, would at last gladly have seen me in the condition from which I rescued him, without the benefit of Eugenius's English powders. An urgent summons to his presence was the consequence. The moment I appeared, "Selim," he cried, "you prescribed the other day for me; I must now prescribe for you!"

I thanked my patron, and assured him that the pleasure of seeing his health restored had put mine beyond the reach of accident.

"You mistake," resumed the bey. "I see by your face that you are ill—very ill indeed! The air of Cairo disagrees with you. Take my advice, and change it immediately for that of the province in which your property lies."

It was something to find that I was not expected to swallow a positive dose, which I feared might cure all my ailments too effectually. Still I considered the prescription as indicating something critical in my case, and exclaimed, "Say at once, sir, that I have lost your favour; say at once you banish me your presence; say that my enemies have prevailed!"

"To prove you mistaken," replied the bey,—"to prove that I lose not so soon all sense of gratitude, I add to my former gift a new one; I name you caimakam* of Samanhood. It is a delightful place, and your residence in your own district will season you to the climate. On your return, you will appear less a stranger among us."

From some lips "I advise" implies "I command."

* Caimakam—lieutenant or official representative of a public personage. The grand vizier, when he takes the command of the Turkish army, leaves his caimakam at Constantinople.

My only business, therefore, was to go where bidden, as soon as invested with the insignia of my office.

Meanwhile, behold me now become Selim-caïmakam! and by the indefeisible privilege of always rising one step at least above one's real rank, giving myself by anticipation all the airs of Selim-kiachef. No little rayah had the misfortune to meet me in the street whom my mokhadam* forced not to jump from off his long-eared steed, and humbly to salute me in the mire. The great fat Frank merchants, indeed, I had the mortification to find as yet more firm in their seats, and could only indulge in the pleasure of bespattering them from head to foot as I passed. These were the follies of my youth; but the recollection has often amused my riper age.

Suleiman's regular bazirghian† was the merchant on whom I chiefly conferred the honour of fitting me out for my lieutenancy. I chose at his shop broadcloths, shawls, silks, muslins, armour, &c. sufficient for the equipage of a bey. These I paid for in orders on my villages; and as the term of payment was distant, so was the price of the goods proportionably high: I therefore felt very indignant, when, alarmed at my increasing requisitions, the wary trader at last swore with great apparent concern that he had not a strip left of the articles I wanted. It put me under the disagreeable necessity of secretly watching some customer of more established credit into his shop, when, gliding in after him, and finding the whole counter covered with the choicest specimens of the very goods which I had in vain demanded, I congratulated the merchant on his seasonable supply, swept away the whole assortment, and resold what I could spare from my own private use.

Spite of Suleiman's impatience to see me gone, I was determined to witness at Cairo the opening of the Kalish. Rather than lose that festivity, I chose to sprain my ankle, and limped to the show. Among the costly articles which I had brought to grace my accession to my government, shone pre-eminent a fine samoor‡ pelisse. This I was dying to display at the fête; and caught a cold on purpose to wrap myself in furs, in the very midst of the dog-days: nor did I stir a step except in my pelisse. The very mob raved of its beauty; and one youth in particular beheld it with such eyes of adoration, that, unable to possess himself of the whole, he cut off the left sleeve, while it hung dangling at my back, and bore it away as a relic. It was mortifying to learn my loss in the midst of my happiness. The sleeve indeed might be replaced, but the pelisse could no longer be worn that day, and with a deep sigh I sent it home. Scarce, however, had its mangled body reached my door, than after it walked in the severed limb. Dropped in his confusion by the thief, it had been picked up by a most conscientiously honest fellow, who, by the greatest good luck, happened to be a tailor into the bargain, and offered to wield his needle with such diligence, as in a trice to enable the signor caïnakam to resume his robe of state. The honest fellow's services were accepted: the cloak was given him, and he retired to work in a little back chamber.

Unluckily, this chamber had a window as well as a door, and having come in at the one, my friend chose for variety to go out at the other. On my looking in to hasten the business, tailor, cloak, and sleeve had disappeared together, nor have they ever since been heard of. I applied to the schaiçh, or chief of the robbers, at Cairo, who, for a certain consideration, undertakes to restore stolen goods; and during the sultriest season of the year had every day fifty pelisses of cat and rabbit skin brought me to examine; but not one of samoor!

Thus bereft of my fairest jewel, I nevertheless proceeded on my journey. According to the custom of the country, I was accompanied by some of the fellahs* of my own estate, to serve me as a sort of hostages for the good behaviour of my remaining serfs; and, in addition to these, had by way of retinue, four black slaves for the service of my person, three hawarees or Barbaresque horsemen for the protection of my vassals, half a dozen kawasses,† to clear my way of caïnaille, and four or five saïs, or grooms to take care of my stud. This consisted, besides the steeds we mounted, of three or four fine led horses for show, as many mules for use, and a dromedary for flight, should circumstances render a retrograde movement expedient. As to asses for incognito expeditions, they were, thank God, to be found every where. This little assortment of bipeds and quadrupeds—spread out on as long a line as possible—formed a very respectable procession, and quite sufficient to make passengers inquire, and have an opportunity of learning, that it was Selim-caïmakam on his way to his government.

I began my journey by land, and spite of the humble entreaties of the schaichs and shehoods* of the different places where I halted, preferred pitching my tents in the open air, to lodging in the close and miserable hovels of the towns and villages; but I took care that the inhabitants should lose nothing by the great man keeping aloof! and consoled them by sending for as much provision of every sort as I could manage to consume or to want. The schaich-el-belled of each district is obliged to supply the public officers on their route at the expense of the district; in consequence of which excellent regulation I should never have given up the more economical way of travelling by land for the more expensive conveyance by water, had not some of the kiachefs on my way been most inconveniently engaged in hostility with the neighbouring Arabs. This rendered part of the road insecure; and as I had but an inadequate force, I resolved after three or four days' march by land to embark on the Nile; myself in a light khandgea,† which went on before, and the bulk of my equipage in a larger and heavier boat behind.

In consequence of the adventure of my pelisse, I had conceived the erroneous notion that the thieves of Cairo far excelled in skill those of the provinces. This opinion, so injurious to the latter, I had occasion to correct. One evening, advancing with a fresh breeze pretty rapidly against the stream, our ears were suddenly struck by the noise of a heavy body plumping into the waves; and inexpressible was my surprise and concern when, running to the stern of the boat, I beheld my best mare, which I had left as I thought fast tied by the legs, swimming away to the land with all her might. Unable to guess the cause of this strange freak, I did all in my power to call the poor beast back, cried out in the most coaxing tone, held up a crust of bread, nay, went so far as to neigh to a miracle: but I might as well have brayed! It was all in vain; for, as if bewitched, she only swam the faster; so that at last I gave orders to tack and row after the fugitive with all possible speed. Noorshah however reached the bank about fifty yards in advance of me, and no sooner had she touched the shore, than out came the secret, in the shape of a thief; who, to my inexpressible horror, started up from behind the animal, cut the strings that confined its legs, threw his own bandy shanks across it, and scampered off. By diving all the way, the scoundrel had contrived unperceived to reach the boat, had crept by favour of the dusk into the hold, and had slipped under the mare; then raising his back under her belly, had tilted her over into the water, and pushed her to the land. Unfortunately, the boasted speed of the animal put out of question all chance of successful pursuit; and Noorshah was placed in my memory, together with the pelisse, among the things that had been.

At Mamflood I again quitted the khandgea. Only five or six days' journey now separated me from my new district, which bordered upon the province of Djirdgé; and the road bore a good character.

On the third morning, however, passing near a mean-looking village of mere mud hovels, I began to doubt its claims to that merit. All the inhabitants, young and old, were under arms; some carrying clubs, others stones, and the most distinguished a rusty sword, or a worn-out matchlock. The enemy against whom they marched, drawn out in most martial array on the brow of an eminence hard by, were the inhabitants of the next village; and inquiring into the cause of hostilities, all the information I could get was that nobody knew it. The hereditary animosity between the districts boasted an origin concealed in the obscurity of ages; but its virulence had been laudably kept up by as many subsequent injuries and retaliations as other business permitted; and to my great edification I understood that, however totally the first cause of the enmity might be forgotten, it was not the less implacable on that account.

Though gratified by so praiseworthy a spirit, I yet took the liberty to represent that, even supposing the happiness of the community beyond enduring, I thought a sufficient alloy might be found in certain regular drawbacks, such as contributions to the sultan, taxes imposed by the beys, provisions claimed by travelling officers like myself, exactions of avaricious landlords, depredations committed by wandering Arabs, and yearly encroachments of the wand on the cultivable soil, together with the incidental circumstances of locusts, plague, imperfect irrigation, mortality, and famine; without rendering indispensable the gratuitous addition of civil warfare and bloodshed between neighbours, begun without a cause, and carried on without an object!

This civil remonstrance I was happy to find was kindly taken, and made a great impression on my audience. They alleged not a single objection, frequently interrupted my speech by cries of "listen! listen!" thanked me humbly when I departed for my good advice, remained stationary in the place where I met them for a considerable time after my departure, and only when I and my suite were quite out of sight, went, and, as I have since understood, gave their enemies the bloodiest battle on record in the annals of their history.

At last, after nearly four weeks spent on the road, I found myself to my great satisfaction performing the last stage of my tedious journey. Suddenly I was aroused from a deep revery by the loud shouts of my suite at the sight of my capital. Delighted at the sound, I expected that the next would announce the appearance of my subjects, drawn out in due state to meet their new governor, with drums beating and colours flying. "How long they must have been watching my arrival!" thought I, as I spurred my horse, and strained both eyes and ears to discover some distant stir; but no symptom of bustle being yet discernible, I again slackened my pace, in order to give leisure for the procession to advance. Vain consideration! I might proceed as slow as I pleased; not a creature appeared to welcome my arrival, and I had to enter my capital unhonoured with the smallest notice. Matters mended not even as I penetrated deeper into the town, though at every street or lane which I successively entered I still entertained fresh hopes of some tardy demonstration of respect; on the contrary, the place looked peculiarly forlorn, every door and window was as empty as if the city had been visited by the plague, and the inhabitants, so far from impeding my passage by their congratulations, seemed rather to have all fled from their homes at my approach. Inconceivably mortified, I fell into a state of such complete abstraction, that I no longer at all minded what I was about, but crossed my capital (which, to say the truth, was among the under-sized) through and through; after a few more turnings and windings, issued forth again at the opposite extremity from that at which I had entered into the open country; and leaving my residence wholly behind me, continued on in full progress towards the saïd. In fact, I might have proceeded in this way, in slow march, to the very end of the world, had not at once a prodigious clamour assailed my ears a hundred yards or two in my rear. It was no less than all the schaichs, shehoods, and notables of the place, who, seeing me thus contemptuously turn my back upon my new subjects and run away from my government, were in full cry at my heels to stop my strange career. Unfortunately, the discord of their shouts had the contrary effect from that which they intended. Imagining it in my abstraction to be some fray in which I had no concern, I only spurred on my horse the faster; and the more pertinaciously the procession pursued me, the harder I galloped. At last, one of my own suite, who in the interval had learned the truth, got me to hear him, and rectified my mistake. My subjects, poor creatures! were less to blame than I imagined. Apprized of my proximity, they had early in the morning taken their station where they expected me to enter, forgetting a bad pass in the road, which, by compelling me to enter at the opposite side, obliged my subjects to run after the governor whom they had marched out in due state to meet. Matters now were soon brought to an amicable understanding, and I turned back in better humour with my people, and without any other ill consequence arising from the mistake, except that the procession entered the town with its governor the wrong end foremost.

It had been sheer modesty in me not to expect a capital at least equal to Raschid or to Fooah. When, therefore, on looking round I saw what a place I was in, the first thing I did was to accuse Suleiman of having treated me with disrespect. It was only by degrees that I came to more reasonable sentiments; that is, I learned to consider mine as a situation, not of amusement, but of profit. Accordingly, I applied with all diligence to the minutiae of its duties, and by great assiduity made such progress in my studies, that in a very short time I was able to tell to a fraction of a para what each feddan of ground might yield, and each head of the subjects be chargeable for, whether to the multezim, the lieutenant, the governor, or the miri;* and as to my pastimes, they only varied between letting leases, imposing contributions, levying fines, receiving presents, and inflicting penalties. Indeed, as the Egyptian fellah makes it a matter of conscience never to pay his rent until compelled by main force, and wears the stripes he has incurred in his resistance as badges of honour, my very financial operations sometimes afforded me an opportunity for indulging in my warlike propensities. Still did my genius in its new sphere shrink into insignificance before that of my Coobtic writer, who, with a salary of six medeens a-day, and a large family to maintain, had become by mere saving as rich as a sultan's seraf. It is true, that whenever he drew a para out of his vest, it was as if he tore his very vitals out of his bosom. Once I tried to make myself master of his accounts, but I might as soon have attempted to find my way in the labyrinth of Crete. When I complained of this worthy personage to my confidential servant, I found little sympathy. Seyed shrugged up his shoulders, said it might be tiresome to be cheated, but it was the regular practice. If the Coobd cheated the multezim, did not the multezim in the same way cheat the caïmakam, and the caïmakam the kiachef, and the kiachef the bey, and the bey the schaich-el-belled, and the schaich-el-belled the pasha, and the pasha the Porte, and the Porte the sultan, who, he was very sure, cheated Allah himself, when he assumed the title of caliph of the faithful?

Whenever I felt tired of the orations and perorations of my steward, I used to go and hear at the mekkiemé the decisions of the cadec. Here, as elsewhere, the conjugal union seemed to be a most frequent source of discord; and in all its various stages, from its origin to its conclusion, a most ample subject of litigation. One day appeared a fair one thus far entitled only to the blushing honours of a bride. In moving terms she stated, that going home in solemn procession to her bridegroom, the faithless swain, instead of wrenching his very door off its hinges to receive her, had shut it full in her face, and had left her to return at her leisure to her parents. Another day came a regularly installed wife; she, poor woman! after possession of her conjugal rights, had been dispossessed more secretly, and now claimed both principal and arrears of interest. And on another occasion walked in an afflicted mourning widow, who, still as much in love with her dead husband as while he lived, only demanded the empty gratification of nightly visiting his grave unimpeded by her churlish relations. She was pretty; her grief affected me; and once or twice I went to the scene of her affliction, to mix my tears with hers.

In Europe, they say, the law demands a long apprenticeship: it is not so among Mohammedans. The Koran and its commentaries decide every case, from a point of faith to a right of gutter, in a few seconds. The form of trial is simple. Every man pleads his own cause, and wonderful is the readiness of the Egyptians in finding answers to every interrogatory, excuses for every action, witnesses to every fact, and sureties for every engagement. I remember a poor fellow who, called upon for his respondents, and having none on earth, had recourse to heaven. Imam Aly was the one he chose; nor durst the other contracting party, albeit a little startled, refuse so respectable a security, however distant the abode of the imam, and difficult the task of enforcing his appearance.

My stay was long enough in my lieutenancy to find the subject of discourse which once had appeared to me the most tiresome, become the most interesting in the world. I mean the rise of the Nile. So far from wishing never more to hear of it, I could think of no other. Yet was it this season a source of most unsatisfactory contemplation. The river seemed in a state of torpor, and was so unusually sluggish in rising, that soon every district trembled lest its waters should remain short of the requisite height. Nothing was heard but lamentations and complaints. One came to tell me of canals which had no chance of receiving a single drop of moisture; another of such as had been drained prematurely of their insufficient contents. Here the legal period for cutting a dam had been wholly disregarded; there a single field had been flooded at the expense of a whole district; every where it seemed as if the dread of a scarcity had made man exert his utmost ingenuity to render a famine unavoidable.

I now became haunted by the phantom of drought, the most dreary that stalks over Egypt's rich domain. My thoughts by day and my dreams by night equally presented to me its ever-extending, blasting form, followed by the whole train of its frightful offspring; unirrigated tracts, fields remaining fallow, insufficient crops, farmers unable to pay their contributions, peasants abandoning their villages, whole troops of fellahs leaving their possessions and their homes to till the land of the stranger, impositions to remit, short rents to receive for the bey, and the caimakam alone held accountable for all the deficiencies of nature and all the waywardness of man. O, how earnestly did I now pray for some lucky incident which might release me from my stewardship and responsibility! But of such a piece of good fortune I entertained no hopes.

It however came, and when it came it failed of its promised pleasure. One morning, as I sat puzzling over some of my writer's explanations, in walked a smooth-spoken gentleman, who, in a civil tone, informed me that he came to take my place; and lest I should doubt his word, handed me an injunction from the bey to return forthwith to Cairo. This unlooked-for recall produced such a revolution in my sentiments, that I now would gladly have given just as much to retain, as I would have done the instant before to get rid of my trust. It is true that to my concern for what I left, was to be added my apprehension of what I might find. So sudden a removal, so little accounted for, savoured of a disgrace. I doubted not but my enemies had improved my absence to undermine my favour; I saw the ichibookdjee at the bottom of the whole affair; and as I had already vowed the insidious pipe-bearer an eternal hatred, I could now only add the vow of a speedy revenge.

Absorbed in my meditations on the best mode of executing what, but for the consequences, was feasible a thousand ways, I one day on my homeward journey rode on so fast as to get entirely out of sight of my suite, when suddenly I found myself breast to breast with a troop of Bedoween Arabs, whose low dusky tents, pitched behind a sand-hill, had remained concealed from my view, till I almost stumbled over them. The same instant the chief of the tribe, followed by half a dozen of its ragged members, advanced upon me with couched spears, demanding either a hundred sequins for my passage, or all I had. Neither of these proposals suited me; but my retinue amounted not to one-fourth of that of the Arabs, and it seemed quite certain that if we came to blows we must have the worst of the fray. Without, therefore, either advancing or answering the summons, I turned round to the foremost of my escort who, by this time had approached within reach, and bid them fill a basket with ball and cartridge. This ammunition I sent the Bedoweens; telling them at the same time it was the only coin in which I paid impositions; but if not content with the quantity offered, they might, as soon as my army came up, have as much more as they could carry away: and that sent by the speediest conveyance. This rhodomontade took effect. The schaich received the gift with thanks, filled the basket in return with superexcellent dates, and bade me pass on with the salutation of peace. This latter I most readily returned; nor waited until my army should be in sight, to hurry with all possible speed out of that of the Arabs.

Brooding all the way to Cairo over the cause of my recall, I at last so completely convinced myself it was an entire withdrawing of the bey's favour, operated by the malicious tchibookdjee, that on entering the capital I thought I read in every countenance the knowledge of my disgrace. This idea made me throw my shawl over my face until I reached the palace. There, meeting at the gate an old and confidential comrade, I for the first time gave vent to my apprehensions, and by way of obtaining, without asking it, more explicit information, cried out, "I was come to look after Osman."—"God forbid!" was all my friend answered.

But these few words, with the ominous smile by which they were accompanied, were quite enough to confirm all my suspicions. What more indeed could I want to be convinced that the thing I feared not only existed, but was of general notoriety? Absolutely beside myself, I rushed up stairs, flew into the bey's apartment, and hardly allowing myself time to breathe, or to perform a respectful salutation, "Sir," cried I, in scarce articulate sounds, "Osman, I know, will never cease his machinations, until he has entirely ruined me in your esteem!"

"If so," coolly answered the bey, "your knowledge far exceeds in its reach even what I imagined; nor did I think poor Osman still continued to disturb your repose, after being himself laid for ever at rest."

"How!" replied I, my ideas now all completely subverted; "is Osman dead?" "And what else," replied the bey, "do you think could have made me send for you in such haste? What but the means of now conferring upon you without any obstacle—but you are too much agitated to listen at present. I must wait to-morrow to unfold my designs. Meanwhile, go and compose yourself."

I went, but whether I obeyed the sequel of the injunction, let the reader tell himself. My imagination, always ardent enough, had been set in a complete blaze ; and, burning with impatience to learn my new destinies, I only felt my agitation changed in its object without being in the least diminished in its intensity. The whole night I kept racking my feverish brain to clothe into some definite shape the bey's vague and desultory hints ; and in my anxious wish for the day that was to clear up the mystery, I began to think night had overslept herself, and the morning, pregnant with my future fate, would never arrive.

At last it duly shone upon the world, I was summoned to my patron's chamber, and gave him no cause to complain of my dilatoriness. Left with the bey in much-portending tête-à-tête, he looked at me, smiled to see the impatience depicted in my countenance, hemmed twice or thrice only to increase the fever of my spirits, and then began his discourse.

CHAPTER XIX.

"SELIM," said Suleiman, in all the solemnity of a set speech, "you have seen our two leaders, and seldom, I should think, can have observed two personages more unlike both in mind and in body. The short, spare form, the mild countenance, the insinuating address, the cautious, calculating turn of the schaich-el-belled could not find greater contrast than in the ferocious features, the colossal frame, the voice of thunder, the violent temper, the fearlessness of danger, the impatience of control, and the prodigality of disposition of his blustering colleague. Little union might be expected between qualities so dissimilar ; and in fact the public at large, which sees Ibrahim ever prefer artifice to force and negotiation to war, while Mourad openly professes to know no other instrument of persuasion but the sword, and dreams as lost every moment given to discussion which might be employed in warfare, regards these two chiefs as constantly on the eve of a rupture, and about to hoist the standard of interminable enmity. But we, who observe more closely, have lost all hopes on that head. It is true, that for the purpose of deceiving the world, of throwing their rivals off their guard, and of keeping their enemies in suspense by the promise of feuds which never happen, Ibrahim and Mourad often affect to be at variance. You may have heard Ibrahim pretend to lament the hot-headed temerity of Mourad, and Mourad in his turn, perhaps with more sincerity, abuse the pusillanimous delays of Ibrahim; but it is easy to perceive that these are only sallies rehearsed beforehand by the performers. Each in his heart feels all the value of that difference of disposition in the other which gives him in his associate precisely all he wants in himself, and duly prizes that opposition in their respective characters which makes Mourad execute with vigour and promptitude all the plans digested by Ibrahim with slow deliberation, enables Ibrahim in his turn to repair by minute parsimony the effects of the prodigality through which Mourad gains over fresh partisans, and again renders Mourad ever ready to cut asunder the knot which Ibrahim is unable to untie! Thus it is that these dissimilar ingredients—like the gold and the steel of a Damascus blade—only cement the two chiefs more closely together, fit them better for supporting their joint interest, make them on all sides present a more impenetrable front, and leave less hopes of those chasms and fissures in their union at which competitors insinuate themselves to divide a party, to drive its members asunder, and to rise on its ruins!

“Some of us, therefore,—Ibrahim-bey Sogeir, Osman-bey Tcherkavi, Moustapha-bey Skanderani, Ayoob-bey the lesser, and myself—have at last come to a determination to bring these all-grasping leaders by main force to a more equal division of the spoil; and even Ayoob-bey Kebir, Youssouf-bey, and Ismail-bey Sogeir, though they still seem to waver, only do so in order that they may sell their co-operation at a higher price. Their irresolute and doubtful conduct, however, would have made us put off the execution of our design until it had had time to acquire greater consistency, did not the present juncture offer advantages which perhaps may never hereafter recur. Ismail and Hassan, after their long sleep at Es-souan, are at last awake, and preparing for a descent to Cairo. Aware how little our assistance is to be depended on should the capital be made the field of battle, the leaders have thought it advisable to hush the storm, if possible, in its cradle, and Mourad is going to march to the Saïd, while Ibrahim stays to awe us at Cairo. Thus separated from his colleague and deprived of half his strength, the schaich-el-belled must, if strenuously attacked, yield to our united force: and in order to be in readiness for the day of trial, we all are busy recalling with the least possible show our adherents from the different provinces. This made me so abruptly summon you from your government, without much considering whether your recall might not for the moment wear the air of a disgrace. You now know what I had to confide to you; nor need I point out the necessity of the utmost secrecy."

Here, by rising from his seat, my patron marked the end of his discourse. The conclusion fell somewhat short of my expectations. Great, undoubtedly, to one like me, was the satisfaction of learning that all the world was going to quarrel: but still I had looked forward to the disclosure of some more directly personal advantage. Again—it occurred to me that Suleiman might fear lest the new favours which he destined for his servant should appear the sole result of his necessities, and might only defer to another sitting the announcing of his intentions respecting myself: all which things considered, I humbly thanked him for his expenditure of breath, made every requisite profession of attachment, fidelity, and zeal, and respectfully retired.

A slave of Ayoob's had been waiting for my appearance near the gate of the palace. The moment I went forth, he came up to me, and rather in a mysterious manner, whispered a summons from his master, which I lost no time in obeying.

As soon as Ayoob saw me, "Signor Caïmakam," cried he, in his eager way—wholly unlike the cold exterior of other mamlukes, who too much resemble volcanoes wrapped in snow—"a most extraordinary occurrence has happened. It is still a secret to all, save the parties concerned: my own family knows nothing of it; and you are the first stranger to whom I impart the wonderful event!

"You know," continued he, after a short pause to fetch breath, "that I spare neither pains nor money, since I cannot have my mamlukes of my own blood, at least to have them of my own country—my beloved Gurgistan. Doomed to live and to die in this distant land, whoever comes from the country of my birth seems to me a relation. Not many days ago my harem was enriched with a new bud reared in the parent soil. In order to save the maiden from the rapacity of her landlord, her friends were going to put her under the protection of a husband's name, at the tender age of eleven: but already they had deferred their purpose too long. Her wedding-day was fixed, when an armed troop carried her off; and ere she had time to become a wife, she was made a slave.

"Brought hither to adorn my garden, this lovely rose of the East became my favourite flower; yet had I the forbearance, ere with eager hand I placed it in my bosom, to observe our sacred custom—to inquire on what stem it had grown, and what walls had sheltered its infancy from the rough blasts of heaven, and the rude touch of man? Selim—would you believe it? In my slave I found a sister!

"The virgin blushing before me was my own father's daughter: was a young and solitary shoot, which, long after the elder branches had been severed from the parent stock, had sprung up to shade the withering top with fresh and tender foliage. For the first time during my twenty years' sojourn in Egypt, I heard the voice of kindred, and felt the yearnings of blood.

"But what is all this to you? perhaps you are thinking. Listen!"

Here Ayooob gave me nearly the same sketch of the state of affairs, and of the views of the party, as Suleiman had done before; except that he spoke of himself as more decided in his sentiments than he had been represented by my patron. I began to fear that I was twice in one day fated to be inveigled, by a hope of personal advantage, into listening to a long detail of other people's concerns. But mark the sequel!

"At a moment so critical," continued Ayooob, "I naturally feel anxious to surround myself with men who to such bravery as comes and goes not with the fumes of hashish,* add such intelligence and skill as may render that courage useful. Of such small is the number; but you are one, and Heaven now affords me the means of attaching you to my house, and of rewarding the surrender I crave of your person to my service. I must provide my newly-found sister with a husband worthy of so great an honour, and able to pay his distinguished spouse undivided attentions. Such a man I cannot find among my mamlukes. The elder individuals of my household already are established; and as to the remainder, they have not yet accomplished their state of probation.

"To you, therefore, I offer Zelidah's youthful hand; to you, who may become my own support as well as my sister's solace! Let me, however, add, that I never should have made the proposal while Suleiman, your old patron, wished to preserve his claims upon you. These, I find, he resigns—for what reason I know not; and I therefore may, without scruple, offer you an alliance with my blood, a share in my honours, and a home in my house."

At this overture I felt utterly confounded. It filled me with pleasure, but at the same time with anxiety. I knew not how to choose between the brilliant offer which came unexpectedly, and the expected favours as yet unbestowed. I dared not hope that Suleiman's thus far undisclosed designs would ever gratify my ambition beyond Ayoob's avowed intentions; but then again, I saw no means of attaching myself to Ayoob without setting at naught the debt of gratitude, and the duties of the allegiance which I owed to Suleiman. In this dilemma between the certain and the promised boon, I magnanimously determined to make the proposals of the strange bey, in the first instance, instrumental only in bringing to the test the munificence of my own patron—reserving their final acceptance or refusal for a later period; and in a speech brimful of those high-flown nothings called thanks, begged Ayoob's permission to ask Suleiman's consent, ere I changed my allegiance—observing, that so far from my favour at home declining, it stood higher than ever; and in order to confirm this assertion, representing, by a little transposition only of the future to the past, those honours which I still expected, as already come to pass, and only for political purposes kept as yet unpublished.

Ayoob seemed not much to relish the idea of his having his splendid offers accepted conditionally, or his liberality submitted to the discussion of a rival, and swore by his beard he thought it very strange: but seeing me immoveable on this point, "Then go," said he at last, "since you will be so obstinate; but remind Suleiman that if he stops the current of my intended bounty, his own should make you unbounded amends; and, above all, stay not long. An hour is the utmost I can bear to be left with my richest gifts thus hanging heavy on my hands."

I promised to be back in much less time; and flew home as on the wings of lightning, to communicate to my patron the substance of the interview with his colleague. On hearing of his offers, he reddened and seemed offended. "By the head of our holy prophet," he cried, in a tone of bitterness, "my brother Ayoob uses me ill: but these are times in which we must hush our resentments; and this Ayoob knows! You, Selim, I cannot blame: his offers took you by surprise, and you could not stop your ears. I however feel happy, that ere my rival made his proposal, I hinted the new favours with which I myself purposed to crown your zeal. You might otherwise suspect me of only acting from the fear of being outbidden. Now mark me. My oldest kiachef, Mooktar, is married, you know, to my first-born daughter. My second kiachef to her sister next in age. My other children already sent forth into the world are provided for in different ways adequate to their deserts. Thank God, I have been able to make all my freedmen lords! My haznadar,* first in rank of those still under my roof, I cannot yet afford to part with; and I do not wish to conceal from you that had Osman lived, his name would have graced the nuptial song sang in honour of my youngest girl. But Providence has called him away, and none of his comrades are yet entitled to an alliance with my blood. I may therefore indulge the suggestions of my heart by giving you my only remaining daughter. It is true, the man she marries must possess a public rank; but this also I give—I name you kiachef. Remember, however, that as my favours are great, so will your duties be arduous.—Of our intended plan of insurrection, the success may depend in a great measure upon your devotion, your skill, and your activity!"

On Suleiman pausing here, I clasped his knees, and poured into his lap all my remaining store of thanks and protestations. This done, I retired to a solitary place to give full scope to my emotions.

"I shall then see myself a kiachef!" exclaimed I aloud, pacing up and down the room in an ecstasy of joy; "I shall then every time I stir out behold dancing before me those dear damasked spears which I so often have coveted! I shall appear abroad only with a handsome retinue, and at home possess my own separate establishment and harem! No longer a mere graft on a strange tree, I shall cast my own roots in the soil, and on my own independent stem bear my own separate fruits. This chin of mine shall henceforth cease to be kept close mown, and shall put forth unrestrained its most luxuriant crops!"* And immediately, with the eagerness of the husbandman, ascertaining whether in his field the budding blade come up close and strong, I ran to the glass to see whether my broad jaw promised to bear a thick and handsome beard; already coaxed and perfumed in anticipation the still sleek unclothed skin, traced in imagination the symmetric outline of its future jetty fringe, and wondered how the new appendage would become the remainder of my features!

My raptures lasted some time ere I remembered that I had promised Ayooob an immediate answer; and as soon as my memory returned my imagination began to wander;—I became suddenly seized with a romantic fit. The substantial advantages were nearly balanced on the rival offers; but as honour threw its additional weight into the scale of my patron, I took it into my foolish head that beauty must preponderate in that of Ayooob. In short, I persuaded myself that Zelidah, by birth a Georgian, by condition a slave—must be as superior in personal charms to Khadidge, a daughter of Egypt, and a descendant of rulers, as the fairest lily is to the dusky bulrush; and determined at every risk to see Ayooob's sister ere I decided.

A Jewess of my acquaintance was the chief purveyor of female finery for Ayooob's harem. I went straight to this useful person, and made her instantly collect some of the richest stuffs she could find. I then put on the blue shift and checkered veil of the Egyptian women of the lower order; and in Sarah's unassuming suite, loaded with all her packages, proceeded to Ayooob's palace—now and then sharply reproved by the way for my long strides and strapping gait.

Zelidah, when we arrived, was unfortunately in the bath, and Signora Sarah had to wait. In order to be less conspicuous the while, I squatted myself down on the floor, in the darkest part of the room. Even this had too much * Luxuriant crops—among the Mohammiedans, slaves are not suffered to let their beards grow; this appendage, therefore, is always a sign of freedom, and generally marks official dignity, or at least gravity of deportment. light to conceal me from Ayoob, who, whether informed of the entrance of a suspicious figure, or from some other cause, himself unexpectedly made his appearance, as if to see his sister. The moment his eye fell upon the bundle into which I had transformed myself, his countenance changed, his brow became contracted, and he rushed out again, muttering to himself some words of ungracious import, and not at all complimentary to somebody's mother.* At this ill-boding symptom, the Jewess turned pale, and striking her breast, "I have brought," cried she, "the thing I should not have come with, and have left behind what I meant to have brought! Go, Ishah; run home, fetch the tissue we were talking of, and return not without it."

Scarce had the words been uttered when heavy footsteps were heard to approach the place. Active as she was, Ishah had but just time to make her escape, and to reach without hindrance the outer gate. Running home as fast as possible, I cast off my disguise, and immediately hastened back to Ayoob in my own proper form and character.

With many apologies for the unavoidable delay, I now solemnly declined the bey's offers, but in terms full of regret, of gratitude, and of protestations. The answer was in the same strain, though, as I thought, delivered somewhat coolly, and in a ruffled manner: and I afterward understood from the Jewess, who had bravely remained at her post, that, in less than half a minute after I had made my exit, Ayoob reappeared in the harem, followed by a host of black eunuchs, and looking blacker than they. He again cast round an inquiring eye; and in seeming disappointment asked what was become of the Egyptian woman. Sarah told off-hand some not quite impossible story, and, expressing a shrewd doubt of her servant's finding the stuff she wanted, went home herself, too glad at encountering no impediment! Thus ended my courtship with the fair Zelidah!

The instant Suleiman's intentions in my behalf became known, the greatest discontent showed itself among his mamlukes. "Their patron," they asserted, "had no right to give his daughters to any but mamlukes, or to make mamlukes any but purchased slaves. Othman-bey, Aboo-seif, and Achmet-bey el Sukari, Turks by nature, and beys by the favour of Ibrahim-kehaya, though precedents, were not examples. The oftener such abuses occurred, the more they ought to be resisted. At last, losing my temper at these repeated murmurings, I went hot with passion to complain to my patron. "Sir," cried I, "your mamlukes judge me unworthy of your favours. Permit me to make them repent of their insolence—equally insulting to yourself and to your servant—or suffer me to renounce your kindness, and bid Egypt farewell."

At these words the bey only stared full in my face, and set up a loud laugh; but perceiving that I joined not in his mirth, and continued immoveably grave, he too by degrees dropped his assumed gayety, and in a serious tone replied, "If, Selim, you really feel desirous to leave me, go! Why should I detain your person, when I cannot prevent the estrangement of your mind? But," continued he, raising his voice until it sounded like thunder, while he darted looks fierce as lightning round the mamluke circle, "I acknowledge not yet my slaves as my masters. Let them harmlessly sharpen with kohl* the soft glances of their eyes, but let them repress the more offensive sallies of their tongues. Too soon may the voice of this presumptuous caste cease to be heard in Cairo! Too soon may we be too happy to replenish our thinning ranks with men not worthy to gird on the sabre of him whom these young fools abuse!"

This speech—supported by a letter from Suleiman's kehaya at Constantinople, read aloud, in which the agent actually complained that the slave market was empty, that the Russian she-emperor had out of mere spite made the padi-shah† give up the yearly tribute of sons and daughters of the Crimea; and that it was feared the whole world meant soon to be at peace—gave me some comfort, and my enemies more discretion.

My marriage being fixed, the wedding soon was announced. Meanwhile, every hour intervening seemed an age. I longed to possess a wife who, if she could not be an object of love, must be an earnest of promotion; and I was dying to have in a harem of my own a sanctuary, where, though my person should be proscribed, my wealth still must remain inviolate, and my dear sequins undisturbed!

* Kohl—a black and almost impalpable powder, used to tinge the eyelids, and supposed to strengthen the sight.

† The padi-shah—the emperor: title given to the sultan.

All things being ready for my nuptials, the ceremony began. My bride was conducted to the bath in state, lest the world should remain in ignorance of her cleanliness. Properly steamed, stretched out, and pumiced, she next went through the labours of a toilet so exquisite, that on its completion not one among her beauties remained nature's own! Several hours were employed in twisting her hair into the semblance of whipcord, in adding to the one hundred and fifty plaits which adhered to her own head, two hundred and fifty braids more, the produce of other scalps; and these were formed into an edifice at once so elegant and so weighty, that she could have wished for a second head merely for common use. Her eyebrows were only dismissed the artificer's hands after being shaped into exact semicircles; and her eyes were not deemed to possess all their requisite powers until framed in two black cases of surmeh.* Henna,† the symbol of joy, which already had been most liberally bestowed upon the epistles which communicated my marriage to my patron's numerous clients, was lavished in still greater profusion on my bride's own plump and lustrous person; and made it emulate the colour which no doubt Isis displayed when doomed to roam through Egypt's plains in the undignified shape of a red cow. After all these pains, taken for the sake of beauty, the lady was, on the score of modesty, wrapped up in so many veils impervious to the eye, as scarce to escape suffocation; but the most celebrated awalis of the capital took care to inform the assistants in their epithalamiums of the splendour of the charms and jewels which they were not allowed to see.

I do not know how, at the nuptial feast, with the prospect of all these attractions before me, and in the midst of all the bustle of the dance, all the din of music, and all the glare of the lights, I insensibly fell into a reverie, composed of at least as many gloomy as cheerful thoughts;—but so it was!

"Here," said my wandering mind, "am I, the youngest son of a petty drogueman in an island of the Archipelago—I, at one time fallen so much beneath the level of my own destiny as in vain to seek the situation of a menial, become the master of a host of slaves, the son to a bey of Egypt, and the governor of a province;—in other words, already occupying a station far beyond what at one time my most sanguine dreams durst have promised me; and yet regarding that elevation only as a stepping-stone to a station infinitely more exalted—to that of bey; nay, who knows? of schaich-el-belled itself!

* Surmeh—another name for kohl.

† Henna—a red juice, extracted from a plant, with which the Egyptians die their women's toes and fingers, and the Persians their horses' tails.

“But by what a series of toils, and sacrifices, and perils, I may be doomed to purchase these honours, who also can tell? Alas! do I not, on the very threshold of a career strewed with as many thorns as roses, begin by yielding up my person perhaps to an unseemly female, and my freedom to a domestic tyrant. For well I know the condition of marrying a patron’s daughter! And what labours, what snares, what treachery may be the offspring of this splendid union, may accompany every step in the road of my advancement, I know not yet. But the die is cast: and I must wait the issue of the game!”

A shake, prolonged by the chief of the singing damsels with the most consummate skill, through every note of the gamut, until it drew forth such a peal of taibs or bravas as made the room shake, roused me from my unseasonable meditations; and brought back my mind to where sat my body. Presently a pretty almé,* inviting me to make her tambarine resound with the clang of my gold, threw my thoughts into a totally new channel. I began to feel impatient for the moment that was first to show me the partner of my future life; and in this disposition deemed every new diversion a new annoyance. “Shall I never see the end,” muttered I to myself in despair, “of these tiresome amusements!”

At last a female messenger secretly summoned me away from the noisy hall of mirth to the silent sanctuary of Hymen. With awe and anxiety I passed its threshold, and was ushered into the presence of her, on whose qualities of person and of mind must depend so great a portion of my future fate. The mysterious veil which till then had concealed her—face, form, and all—from my inquisitive eye, fell at her feet; and I saw—

“What?” wonders perhaps the reader. “An angel of light, sent from the highest heavens, on purpose to make my earthly dwelling a paradise?”

“Oh no! that would have been too unreasonable an addition to my good fortune.”

* Almé—the singular of awalis or singers.

"An ugly little monster, then? sufficient, were this earth a heaven, to convert it into a hell?—A being calculated to stamp on each endearment all the merit of martyrdom?"

Alas! is it then decreed that the human mind must always, from one extreme, run straight into the other? like the ball whose recoil is ever projected! And are there not a sufficient number of individuals in the world neither handsome nor ugly!

Of my spouse at least I do not know what else could have been said with due adherence to truth. Her face was neither of a description to excite, in defiance of reason, a very extravagant passion; nor yet of a species to damp, in despite of duty, a more legitimate ardour. Like other plants kept carefully secluded from the beneficial aspect of the sun, this prisoner of the harem certainly had a sickly, pallid hue. Bounded by its sable locks, her wan, colourless face might aptly be compared to the moon surrounded by darkness; but then again, from the midst of this unvaried expanse her large languishing black eyes shot forth glances like lightning when it pierces the clouds; and, as virtue is its own reward, the assurances of unbounded devotion which my situation called for tarried not to diffuse over Khadidge's countenance some of that animation which alone seemed wanting to class her, if not with the Helenas and the Cleopatras of two thousand years ago, at least with the prettiest of the mongrel race which at present grace the land of Egypt.

But ere from the hour when I first beheld my spouse the sun had completed one single of its daily revolutions, not a doubt remained on my mind that I had obtained, instead of a mistress, a master. I had only changed my allegiance from the father to the daughter, and from a lord's dependant was become a lady's slave. Nor was even the general rule applicable to whatever mamluke married his patron's offspring modified by the peculiar disposition of the lady Khadidge. Quite the reverse. Within a most delicate frame the young lady concealed a most unbending mind. The least breath of air seemed capable of annihilating her person, but no breath of man had any power to influence her will. Already in the first coyness of the bride there lurked more of pride than of timidity; and in the subsequent altered conduct of the wife, there shone forth an exaction of dues rather than a surrender of affections. Jealousy, indeed, Khadidge felt, and in all its force; but it was of that contracted sort which fears the loss of a tangible property rather than that of a mental tenure;—of that sort which in a man rests satisfied when he has locked up his wife. As Khadidge could not, consistent with custom, in the same way lock up her husband, she took care not only to let me have no female retinue of my own, but to keep concealed from my view all the nymphs of her own suite that might divert my feelings from their legitimate current. The instant my footsteps were heard near the gynæceum, all its inmates short of sixty used to hide themselves or fly, leaving me with my lady in awful tête-à-tête. In one instance, indeed, the anxiety of the attendants to obey their instructions defeated its own purpose. A young and pretty slave, unable to get away in time, took the desperate resolution of creeping under a clothes-basket in the very middle of the room through which I had to pass. In the dark I fell headlong over the awkwardly placed utensil; and in my rage, grasped with such violence the bundle within, which I accused of my downfall, that ere I recognised its nature, my spouse, whom the noise had attracted, found her fair attendant infolded in my arms. In vain I pleaded ignorance of what I thus had grasped. The pretty slave never more was beheld!

“And Anastasius, the impatient of control,” methinks exclaims my reader, “submitted tamely to such egregious tyranny.”

Alas! already had the climate of Egypt begun to exert over my energies its enervating influence; already had I imbibed all the languor with which its watery exhalations by degrees affect foreigners; already was I, in point of listlessness and apathy, a perfect match for my indolent helpmate. While she lay all day long motionless on her sofa at one end of the house, I lay all day long equally motionless in my recess at the other end; and if she could scarce accomplish the labour of clapping her hands* for a slave, to hold up a chip of tensook† to her nose, I could hardly go through the exertion of calling an attendant to sprinkle a few drops of some sweet scent over my beard. Hour after hour I used to sit inaccessible to visitors, in a sort of trelliced birdcage, suspended over the kalish, * Clapping her hands—which in the East, where servants are always in waiting in the room, stands in lieu of ringing the bell.

† Tensook—small tablet of musk or amber puffing clouds of perfume through a pipe cooled in rose-water, and deeming an anteree thin as a cobweb too heavy clothing for my delicate person.

I felt the more anxious to enjoy the moments of repose still within my reach, as I considered the days of toil to be at hand. The rumour of Ismail and Hassan's impending descent every day acquired new strength, and the preparations of Mourad for a southward march every day became more active. But the whole was a bubble, and it burst at last. Misunderstandings arose between the exiles in the Saïd and the Arab schaichs on whose alliance they depended. The quarrel rose at last to such a height, that the Bedoween troops already with the beys again retired into the desert. The expedition to Cairo, therefore, was given up, and with the plot fell the counter-plot. On all sides affairs seemed to assume, for a season at least, an aspect more calm and serene.

Meanwhile I had secured my kiacheflik as well as my spouse; and finding that for some time to come I was not likely to be called out on actual service, I felt it incumbent upon me to act like other governors, who annually visit their provinces, and spend a few weeks in the agreeable occupation of regulating the police and levying the contributions of their various districts. For the purpose of appearing in my government with proper eclat, I mortgaged one year's income of my estate, took an affectionate leave of my patron, sighed with my wife over the duties of my station, and set out to riot in the luxury of receiving presents and imposing avanahs.

CHAPTER XX

ACCORDING to custom, I journeyed slowly. On setting out in the morning, the attendants of my tent used to gallop on in advance, and on arriving in the evening I used to find it pitched. In order to vary the scene, I frequently during my march assumed some disguise. Sometimes it was that of a travelling Syrian, sometimes of a Barbaresque, and sometimes of an Arab enveloped in his abbah.* Thus fearless of observation, and aloof from any suite, I amused myself in prowling about the country, and peeping into the peasants' hovels. My servants, indeed, discouraged this mode of travelling; they never ceased to express their uneasiness at their lord's thus exposing his precious person; but the more good reasons they gave for my staying with my retinue, the farther I extended my rambles. I wanted to see all that passed; and if the master's eye be the best, the master's garb is the worst for making discoveries. My trouble seldom went unrewarded. In one place, the village schaichs, mistaking me for the kiachef's caterer, offered bribes of fattened fowls to make me swear there was a complete famine. In another, the townfolks, honouring me with the office of the great man's steward, promised me one whole piastre out of each sequin which I disbursed on his account; and in a third, where I passed for an entire stranger to the travelling officer, they invited me to go halves with them in robbing his equipage on the highway. Here an Arab, who was abusing a fellah for preferring the service of the mamluke to the freedom of the desert, appealed to me as a brother Arab for the justice of his reproach; and there a peasant, who was describing to a townsman the rapacity of the kiachef's people, referred to me as to a fellow-peasant for the truth of his assertion.

One day, in my solitary rambles, I met on its way to the river a family of villagers, consisting of three generations and upwards; for besides grandfather, father, and sons, several of the daughters seemed burthened with more than the babes they bore on their backs. An ihram in rags, an old mat torn to pieces, and an assortment of pitchers worthy of an antiquarian's collection, were the travelling relics of the deserted home. A few head of consumptive cattle formed the van, and a worn-out plough closed the procession.

"Whence come you, good people?" cried I, addressing the patriarch of the family. "From the Feyoum," was his answer.

"And you leave the native soil to seek the bread of strangers?" "Soon I shall be called away, and my son will not be able to redeem his inheritance. Shall he wait to be driven from the land his father tilled?"

"Whence arises your distress?"

"From God and man in conjunction. Every day our kalish grows more encumbered; every year our soil creeps further under the advancing sands. Alas! as if the very sources of fertility became exhausted with age, our noble stream itself seems tired of flowing, and for the last two years has made abortive efforts to attain its ancient height. Egypt's soil, instead of crops, will soon only bear corpses. Can we then fly too soon?"

"And let those that stay behind bear the burthen of the absent?"

"Those we leave to-day would have left us to-morrow."

"Who is your lord?"

"Even that we scarce can tell. One day it is the sultan, in whose name we are taxed; another the beys, who are employed to tax us, or the delegates of those beys throughout all their numberless stages; another the mul-tezim or owner, who accounts with the beys; another the Arab schaich, who rents the land of the owner. All call themselves our masters while we can pay them tribute; all deny their being so when we want their protection!"

My retinue now came in sight. "Hark ye," added I, therefore, in haste, "servants should not betray servants, but here come the masters. Take this, therefore, and go;" and hereupon I gave the party to the amount of a piastre, begging they might not huzza lest the lord should hear the noise.

Scarce had I at the ensuing halting-place sat down to my welcome supper, when in burst a fellow dragging by the sleeve another of the same class. "This rogue," said the first, "is the man who last year stole your lordship's mare." Of course the heavy charge was most solemnly denied; but not minding what I considered as a thing of course, "Scoundrel," said I to the accused, "had you been content at least with only taking my black mare! but to rob me of my white one—" "The white one!" exclaimed the man, "as Allah is my witness, I never once came near her!" "No more you did," was my reply, "for there she stands; but the black one you stole, I find, and for her you shall swing."

I was still exulting in my ingenuity on this occasion, and thinking myself at least a Solomon,*—or a Sancho—when, passing by a Latin hospice on the outskirts of the town, my ear was assailed by most pitiful groans; and looking through a latticed window, I discerned their cause in the shape of a flagellation, which a lusty friar was inflicting with his knotty girdle, not on his own sturdy back, but on the much less powerful shoulders of a little yellow Coobd, whom he forcibly held down before him. Doubting the efficacy of this mode of instilling a doctrine, I interposed, and inquired of the missionary the reason of this paternal correction.

* A Solomon—it stood in the original Suleiman, which is the same name.
VOL. I.—L

"While we distributed rice," replied the friar, "this fellow chose to become a Catholic; now that supplies grow scarce, and that we hardly have enough for ourselves, he brings me back his chaplet, and cries, 'no pilaff, no pope!'"

The conduct of the little Coobd I certainly could not approve; but it reminded me of my own towards Padre Ambrogio. I conceived a fellow-feeling for the defenceless sufferer, and released him from the clutches of his ghostly corrector. Thus it was, that to my former achievements I added those of a true knight-errant, and became, if not so indefatigable a manslayer as Antar, at least a worthy rival of Don Quixote.

Knight-errantry, however, was entirely set aside as soon as I came within the pale of my own jurisdiction. The first hovel within its precincts which I entered gave me but an indifferent opinion of the condition of my vassals. In the mud of the doorway lay weltering—affected in various degrees with the rheum that was to end in total blindness—five or six bloated brats, quite naked, and fighting for a bit of mouldy millet cake, the size of my little finger. Further on, in the cabin, sat over a heap of buffalo's dung, and quite enveloped in its offensive smoke, a female spectre, mother of these gaunt abortions, who, on seeing a stranger, tore the only rag from off her body, to cover with it her face; and at the most distant extremity of the hovel, stood the head of the dismal family, burying the bag of rice intended for its support in the earth that formed the floor. One more spadeful thrown over the store would have completed its concealment when I made my appearance. At this awful sight the spade dropped out of the peasant's hands; and the rag he called his turban rose a full inch from his head.

"Be composed, my friend," cried I, "it is not the enemy that is coming, it is your own governor."

"Alas!" replied the man, "will not the kiachef devour my rice, and can the Bedoween do more? But since you have seen the heap, take half, and mention not the other, or we must all perish!"

"Come," rejoined I, "for once keep the whole; but when my writer calls for my tribute, remember I know your hiding-place, and think not your honour engaged to let yourself be cut in stripes, before you pay the rent you owe!"

"And this, then," thought I, "is the land which its infatuated natives boast to be the finest on the earth; where they would rather die of want than live in plenty elsewhere. That it has a hidden charm I needs must believe, since all obey its attraction; but where it lies I cannot yet discover. I am now in the very heart of that Feyoom so famous for its roses, and all that yet has struck my senses is the smell of its cow-dung!"

Arrived at the place of my residence, I immediately set about receiving with all proper dignity the homage and the presents of my subjects. My writer took special care that none of my vassals should have to complain of my forgetfulness. To each he sent a summons to welcome their lord; and his invitations were addressed not only to the aboriginal and stationary cultivators of the soil, but also to the Arab schaichs, who occasionally here and there rented a district. The liberality of these latter on this occasion exhibited various shades of difference. The first of my Bedowee* tenants who attended my summons gave me, over and above the tribute due, two camels, a dromedary, and fifty fat sheep, with fleeces white as snow. "This begins well," thought I. The second produced for my acceptance a present of a different hue—two jolly Abyssinian damsels of the most complying temper: observing "that even ivory looked insipid, unless contrasted with ebony." The third only presented his landlord with a lean steed; but then he was of noble blood, and his pedigree so long that it would have reached to Cairo. "Even this is not much amiss," said I to myself. A fourth Arab chief now made his appearance, who gave me not a single para beyond the stipulated rent; and to him I only grew somewhat reconciled when there came a fifth, who raised such a commotion, that I would willingly have remitted all he owed me, with a handsome consideration on my side into the bargain, to see a hundred leagues of imperviable desert separate our respective jurisdictions.

I had left the Lady Khadidge my wife fully occupied in collecting every species of amulet and charm, and recommending herself to the efficacy of every form of devout orison and practice, in vogue either among Mussulmans or Christians, for the purpose of seeing her waist lose on my return its perverse slimness: but, except on the score of progeny, felt with respect to my spouse in the most happy security, when unexpectedly an express arrived from Cairo, with the sad tidings that she had not only been seized with a sudden illness, but was actually considered as in very great danger. As, however, the sapient Moslemin Esculapius called in on the occasion, had decided upon the case without seeing the patient, on the mere evidence of a bit of silk thread tied round her wrist, I chose not implicitly to trust to his report, and immediately set off myself with all speed for the capital—resolved that some Frank physician should, if possible, cure my wife, even at the risk of seeing her; and only puzzled how to bring about so desperate a measure!

Alas! it was written that I myself should behold her no more! Just before the last stage of my journey the breath of life had left her for ever! My speed only brought me home in time to hear the disinal howlings that were raised on my youthful helpmate's decease. At my first alighting in the courtyard of the house of mourning, a fresh peal of woolliah-woes, louder than any former, went forth from every window, by way of appropriate greeting; and, without much preparation, gave me the first notice of my loss. I was next dragged by force of arms to the place where lay an insensible corpse, she whom my last parting look had left elate in all the pride of youth, of health, and of power. Plates of gold covered the coffin, dazzling tissues hung around it, and flowers of every hue filled the air with their fragrance, as if to mock, or to render more dismal by their gaudiness, the foul corruption at work within. "O Khadidge," cried I, at this solemn and appalling sight, "too soon has thy tale been told: too soon hast thou glided by like a noon-day shadow; too soon has the rough wind of death swept away the just expanding blossom of thy existence!" and hereupon I let the funeral proceed. For already the attendants were chiding me that I thus rudely kept the black and blue angels of the tomb waiting for their new guest.

My myrtles now faded ; my only shade now being that of the cypress, I went and deposited my grief at Suleiman's feet. A good deal afflicted himself, he yet preserved his wonted courtesousness, and assured me that his sentiments in my behalf would ever remain unchanged. I thanked him for saying so ; but felt that I had lost the surest pledge to his favour, and was tempted to apply the Greek saying, " Welcome this misfortune, so it come but single !"

A mamluke seldom finds much leisure for mourning. Scarce had I composed myself for the purpose, when my retirement was invaded by a rumour that the expedition against the beys of Upper Egypt, a few months before unexpectedly abandoned, had been as unexpectedly resumed. It soon was followed by a strange report that Mourad had actually set out on his march for Es-souan. This event would only have afforded us a subject for rejoicing, had not the Signor Mourad—whether with the view of reserving for his own adherents all the profits of the campaign, or in the idea of leaving Ibrahim provided in his absence with sufficient means of defence—contented himself with only taking on this occasion his own troops, instead of all those at Cairo which belonged to his party ; whence the schaich-el-belled retained a larger force at his disposal than was desirable for the success of our plan. Still, despairing of a more favourable opportunity, we determined to put it forthwith into execution : and a meeting of all the principal confederates was convened at Ayoob's palace, to determine upon the best mode of proceeding.

When it came to my turn to give my opinion, I proposed rushing at once with all our host upon the schaich-el-belled, surprising him in his palace ere any assistance could reach him from the citadel, and running every hazard in order to secure his person. No hint whatever was to be given him of the least dissatisfaction lurking in our breasts ; above all, no proposal of any sort was to be made, nor no step to be taken that could put the wily chief in any way upon his guard, ere this purpose was accomplished. When once fairly in our power, Ibrahim must submit to whatever terms and grant whatever securities we chose to prescribe.

Several of the party, and among others Suleiman my patron, felt the expediency of this decisive conduct; and supported my proposal with all their influence: but Ayooob as strenuously opposed it. He would not hear of proceeding, as he called it, to extremities with the head of the corps, until milder measures had been tried; and when I reproached him with faint-heartedness, looked significantly, first at me, then at the farther corner of the room, and at last cried out in an angry tone, "that at least he never yet had fled from any place in women's clothes."

Encouraged by the sentiments of this leading personage, some of the lesser members of our party now in their turn opposed my scheme with all the resolution of cowardice; and the boldest measure which could obtain the assent of the majority, was that of marching out of Cairo, collecting all our forces in the Koobbet-el-hauc, and from our camp sending Ibrahim the option of compliance with our terms or immediate and interminable warfare. On this poor and spiritless conclusion of the meeting Suleiman in his wrath rent his garment, I shrugged up my shoulders, and the few that had common sense considered our affairs as lost.

According to the plan resolved upon, as soon as Mourad was supposed to be sufficiently advanced on his way to the Saïd, we bravely rushed out of the capital, pitched our camp under the city walls, and deputed Saleh, the ablest of Ayooob's kiachefs, to lay before Ibrahim our long list of grievances. On the first blush of the business, the schaich-el-belled appeared more frightened, and more disposed to grant redress, than I durst have hoped. He seemed ready to accede to any terms; and only wanted—he assured us—clearly to understand what were our wishes.—Those who had insisted on gentle measures now triumphed, and looked all exultation. In the course of the negotiation, it is true, their confidence in their sagacity abated a little. The first panic of the chief seemed gradually to subside: he showed symptoms of returning resolution; and contrived to make the affair drag on a long while after the expected period, ere it came to a conclusion. At length, however, he agreed to our demands; the treaty was put into writing, and emissaries went out in every direction to collect such of the schaich-el-belled's creatures as were to be securities. We only waited for the hostages, triumphantly to enter the city and take possession of the government.

All at once a most appalling report spread through the camp! While we were quietly drawn up under one extremity of the city, Mourad, it was said, had with all his forces re-entered its precincts at the other. Informed on his march of our insurrection—which perhaps its only object had been to bring about prematurely—he had redescended the left bank of the river, crossed over at Djizeh, and resumed his post at Cairo, ere the enormous circuit of this city had permitted our receiving the least intimation of his precipitate return; and the very messenger who was to have brought us the pledges for the fulfilment of the treaty, brought the first authentic intelligence that all negotiation was at an end! “Tell my friends without the gates,” were the last words addressed to this personage by Ibrahim, “that since they have taken the trouble to quit Cairo of their own accord, they have nothing to do now but to make the best of their way to Upper Egypt; Mourad, my colleague, is less enduring than I am.”

We looked aghast; but followed the schaich-el-belled's advice. Raising our camp without a moment's delay, we glided in haste behind Mount Mokhadem, and during four days marched without interruption along the back of the rugged ridge of which it forms the extremity. Then crossing its uneven width, we on the fifth morning gained the river. This too we passed, and soon, on its western bank, reached the town of Minieh.

Here we fixed our head-quarters. Our position afforded us every convenience for what was next in our wishes to ruling at Cairo—starving the capital by intercepting its supplies. To contribute to this laudable purpose as effectually as possible, I stationed my own little troop in the vicinity of Ash-moonin, where I had opportunities of making good captures and of manifesting great impartiality. The time in truth admitted not of nice distinctions between friends and foes: besides which there lurked about me I do not know what presentiment that my sojourn in Egypt was drawing to a close. I therefore determined to make the most of my time while I staid. Summer insects sting sharpest in autumn, when they begin to grow weak.

Still it was my study that the little offerings of my friends should appear the sole result of their own liberality. Receiving intelligence one day that a rich Coobd of Cairo was to be on the road, I took special care to greet him on his passage. "I knew your intentions, my worthy friend," said I, "of travelling this way with all your money and jewels; and for old friendship's sake immediately scoured the country, that you might meet with no extortion." Davood was all thanks. "Set bounds to your gratitude," resumed I; "the two hundred sequins you destine me for my trouble I positively will not take. All I can consent to is to accept a hundred." Davood began to remonstrate. "No words," cried I, "but the sequins; for the robbers still are near!" So thought Davood, and paid the money.

CHAPTER XXI.

HUNGER, they say, drives the wolf out of the forest: it certainly in the year eighty-three drove the schaich-el-belled out of Cairo; but with a full determination to clear the banks of the Nile, of which we entirely impeded the navigation. Some surprise indeed was created by thus seeing the two leaders exchange offices and characters: for while Ibrahim sallied forth in warlike trim to attack the enemy, Mourad remained in the capital a tranquil spectator of the fray. The conclusion, however, showed that for once Mourad had foiled Ibrahim with his own weapons. During the march of the schaich-el-belled, his colleague negotiated so successfully with the sultan's pasha, that he induced the vizier to invest two of his mamlukes—Osman-kiachef surnamed Tamboordgi, and Mohammed-kiachef called the Elfi—with the rank of beys.

This proceeding of Mourad's appeared so suspicious to Ibrahim, that he began to fear lest his colleague might be meditating the same game which he himself had played before; and having drawn him out of Cairo, might shut its gates against his re-entrance, as he had shut them against ours. He therefore changed his plan, or at least seemed to do so; and made this occurrence the pretext for sparing us the battle which he probably never had intended to give. Instead of waging savage war, he proposed terms of peace. Our leaders judged it prudent to meet his advances; and in October of the same year Ibrahim reinstated our whole party in Cairo.

Mourad now in his turn sullenly marched out ; but we at first heeded not much his pettishness : as it is far from a rare occurrence for the rulers of Egypt to agree most amicably upon a rupture. The apparently impending hostilities afford each party a pretence for imposing on its adherents and clients extraordinary contributions ; and when the last para for the warlike preparations is paid—lo and behold ! the world is gladdened with the news of a reconciliation.

On this occasion, however, Mourad protracted the show of warfare somewhat longer than usual ; and indeed acted his part with such truth of imitation, as almost to impress us with the idea of the reality : for not only he actually retired into the Saïd, but there continued with such earnestness the task which we had undertaken of destroying the supplies of the capital in their very sources, that Ibrahim at last began to think the joke too serious, and in order to appease his rival, again sent us fresh notice to quit the capital. It was unpleasant to be thus bandied to and fro ; but at this juncture braving Ibrahim would have been braving the whole force in the citadel, ready to move at his command. Thus deprived of every hope of successful resistance, we agreed to obey ; but only with the view of executing a scheme proposed many times, and as often rejected, of coalescing in the Saïd with Ismail and Hassan.

I was at home when the resolution of our beys to quit Cairo reached me. Immediately on receiving it I collected all that was most valuable in my harem, and while the beasts of burthen were loading, walked over the various apartments of my abode, as one who bestows a last look on friends he leaves for ever. “Happen what may,” exclaimed I, “here I have at least enjoyed a few moments of ease and quiet, whose existence fate has no power to expunge from the records of time ! Should I, while I live, enjoy no other, my mind will revert to these with a grateful recollection !” All now being ready, I joined my patron, and with the rest of our party marched out of the city.

In the full confidence that Ibrahim must make the peace-offering required of him, Mourad had redescended from the Saïd along the eastern banks of the Nile, and had returned to the vicinity of Cairo. From the heights of the Mokhadem he saw our troop wind along the plain. He had the vantage-ground, and thought the moment propitious for exterminating our hostile body at a blow.

To rush down the hill with all his force, and attack us like a lion who sees an unsuspecting prey, was the work of an instant. Fortunately, his superior numbers were exhausted by a long march, while our fewer men all were fresh. We therefore received the shock of the first onset without giving way, and a bloody combat immediately ensued.

As usual, the mamlukes of each different house at first remained in close order round their chiefs; and I therefore fought next my patron, until, wounded in the shoulder, he was carried to the rear, when I acquired greater latitude of movements. Spying in the thickest of the fight a son of Osman's, to whom, for many a treacherous action, I long had owed an adequate return, I took aim at him while firing his carbine, and lodged a ball in his side, which made him bite the dust. One of Elfi's hairbrained children instantly sprang forward to revenge his friend's death, and made a thrust at his slayer. I received the stroke on my yatagan, and with a well-timed blow sent him too reeling out of the field. He scarce had gone fifty yards ere he fainted and fell. Another myrmidon of Mourad's now advanced: Assad was his name. Proud of his size and strength, he deemed himself secure of victory before he fought; and in order to give greater splendour to his triumph, prefaced his assault with the most insulting language. The clash of swords soon followed; and here again mine proved the better blade. My adversary's sabre was shivered in his hand, and himself unhorsed and brought to the ground. Maddened by his previous taunts, I was going to despatch him; but he expressed such contrition, and begged mercy so piteously, that I agreed, though reluctantly, to spare his worthless life. Scarce had I turned my head to call to my people, when the wretch, deliberately taking aim, fired his pistol at me. The ball grazed my cheek, and only tore my turban. I now dismounted to plunge my dagger to the scoundrel's heart; but in the very act of lifting my poniard, a bullet struck my hand, and paralyzed my fingers. I dropped my handjar: and Assad—with a sudden jirk, tearing himself away from my mamlukes, who already were seizing hold of the traitor—darted afresh amid the thickest of the combat, and slunk out of sight.

In despair at this grievous disappointment, I now vaulted back into my saddle, but, from the uselessness of my left hand, was unable either to hold my reins or wield my firearms. Soon, therefore, my horse, unsupported by his rider, came down completely. Thrown off and lamed by the fall, I was obliged, for some time, to defend myself against a mamluke enemy with one knee to the ground. While with my yatagan I parried his unceasing blows, another of his party tried to ride over and trample me to death: but spite of his rider's urging voice and stirrup, the generous steed refused to obey; and my own horse, who had got upon his legs again, now exhausted with loss of blood, fell dead by my side, and served me as a rampart. Yet still my helpless state must soon have left me at the mercy of my well-mounted adversary, had not, at this juncture, my own mamlukes dashed through the adverse current, and come to my assistance. One of them struck my enemy in the loins. He fell backward in his saddle, was immediately pulled off his horse, and I raised up and mounted in his stead. I could, however, only hold my reins with my teeth, and guide my courser with my sword, while raging with the thirst of vengeance, I flew from rank to rank to seek the traitor Assad.

Already the falling dusk seemed to deny every act of personal animosity, and to permit a continuance only of random blows and general slaughter. My search, therefore, was fruitless! Ere yet, however, the closing night had dropped its sable curtain entirely over the combat, a colossal form, soaring like the spirit of evil, caught my searching eye. Instantly I threw myself down, stooped close to the ground, penetrated athwart the surrounding phalanx, and, while the haughty chief was giving a signal, struck at his face one single furious blow. A second must have wrought my own death; I therefore tarried not, but, under my horse's belly, assisted by the darkness, made my escape. At this instant a loud and long shout of terror announced to all his men that Mourad was wounded; and his hated blood, drawn by me, formed the last event of the expiring battle.

Our principal apprehension had been all along lest Ibrahim, apprized of the engagement, should sally forth, and support his colleague from the citadel. Probably he wished not to render his rival's success too complete; and Mourad himself, now having had enough of fighting, no longer opposed our retreat. He entered the city, while we, gathering up our most distinguished dead, to be consigned to vulgar earth on the road, continued our march, uninterruptedly, all night. Suleiman, who suffered much from his wound, was carried in a litter; and I, with my hand in a sling, and my leg bandaged up figured on a jaded hack. I regretted the richly caparisoned steed of my enemy Assad, which I one moment had regarded as mine; I still more grievously regretted the home-thrust of my dagger, which I hoped to have made his: but my successful aim at Mourad himself, the ugly gash imprinted on his rugged jaw, and the streams of blood gushing from his hateful face, though sights which I had not had leisure to enjoy in the original, were a rich treat for my imagination!

Several years had elapsed between the first combat I witnessed and this last engagement. In both I was allowed to have shown some valour: but how different were the sentiments which, on these different occasions, nerved my arm! In the fight against the Arnoots, I only obeyed a vague desire to gain applause, and to vent the empty ferment of my youthful ambition. I fought the foe as I would have hunted the beast of prey; no personal rancour gave venom to the wounds I dealt. Here, on the contrary, every feeling of personal interest, animosity, and revenge, directed my aim, and dwelt on my blows. After hewing down my enemy, I greedily contemplated his fall, and could almost have wished to turn my weapon round and round in his wound: my soul seemed to thirst after his blood as after a refreshing stream; and when the hot spring gushed from Mourad's own swelling veins, I could have dared death itself to riot in the crimson tide!

Just at the period when the animosity between the insurgents and the chiefs of Cairo was at its height; when both parties had sealed their enmity with their blood; when all chance of reconciliation seemed for ever at an end, arose that never-failing healer of internal feuds, the fear of an external enemy. A report, bearing the stamp of undoubted authority, suddenly spread itself through Cairo, that Hassan was making immense preparations at Constantinople for reinstating Ismail. Immediately the terrified leaders sent after our fugitive troop proposals of mutual forgiveness. The bearers, intrusted with no less credentials than Mourad's own ring and chaplet, reached us the sixth day of our march, in the midst of the mountains. The sole indispensable condition of the reconciliation they offered was a sacrifice of a few of our bey's trustiest followers, whose spoil was wanted to feed the rapacity of their own mamlukes. It is true, the interests of these very adherents had been the ostensible pretext of the rupture : but they were readily given up as a peace-offering, when deemed the only obstacle to renewed harmony.

Among the appointments to be ceded was mine. Suleiman, indeed, proposed a commutation ; but whether Mourad knew the author of his wound, or from whatever other cause, he would hear of no other exchange. My father-in-law, therefore, ended, like other politicians, by yielding to circumstances. He declared himself unable alone to resist the importunities of all the other beys, and I was summoned to give up my possessions. Thus were realized the effects which I apprehended from the loss of my wife.

My patron had only yielded, he said, to superior force ; I thought it fair to follow his example. When, therefore, the storm burst forth, I gathered together my trustiest followers, and, instead of returning to Cairo, and expressing my readiness to be stripped—as I was expected, in deference to higher interests, to do—struck across the country, passed the river, and reached my kiacheflik. There, intrenched in the best manner I was able, I bade my antagonists take the trouble of turning me out.

During a whole month they seemed averse from the task, until at last I thought myself forgotten ; but on the fifth week after my arrival, I received intelligence that my successor was coming. He was accompanied by a force so very superior to what I could muster, that I gave up the kiacheflik for lost, and only resolved to make the new kiachef pay a handsome admission fee. Collecting all my cash, jewels, and other valuables, I loaded with them half a dozen camels and dromedaries, freed my slaves, gave away my fixtures, and, followed by my small troop of faithful mamlukes, posted myself in ambush a few leagues from the town, in a place where I knew the enemy must pass. It was an elevated plain, advantageously suited for my purpose. In front rose a hillock covered with ruined koobbehs,* cactus hedges, and date-trees, which screened us completely, while behind lay an open country, and a kalish, with a bridge of boats and boards, which secured our retreat.

After a whole night of tedious expectation, we early in the morning heard the tramp of horsemen, and presently the enemy came in sight. By his loose and straggling order of march, it was plain he had no suspicion of our design: and soon the troop approached so near our masked battery that we could discern the features of every individual. Heavens! how my heart bounded when in the chief—in the stranger who came to dispossess me—I recognised the identical Assad who had tried to take away my life as my reward for saving his own. I immediately made a signal to my followers to leave in my own hands the soothing task of just revenge, took the best aim I was able, and fired. A general discharge instantaneously followed: but I had the inexpressible satisfaction of seeing Assad fall first, though several of his troop soon bit the dust around him. The remainder, unable to guess the force of their invisible assailants, immediately took flight and dispersed in all directions.

Save the place which my men occupied, there was not a spot in sight where the fugitives could halt and rally. The rout of those that remained sound, therefore, enabled me to approach the wounded. Assad, though weltering in his blood, was still alive; but already the angel of death flapped his dark wings over the traitor's brow. Hearing footsteps advance, he made an effort to raise his head, probably in hopes of approaching succour: but beholding—but recognising only me, he felt that no hopes remained, and gave a shriek of despair. Life was flowing out so fast, that I had only to stand still—my arms folded in each other—and with a steadfast eye to watch its departure. One instant I saw my vanquished foe, agitated by an unceasing tremor, open his eyes and dart at me a glance of impotent rage; but soon he averted them again, then gnashed his teeth, convulsively clenched his fist, and expired. I spurned the lifeless wretch with my foot.

Wishing now for nothing more, I only sought the speediest retreat, fell back in all haste, and got to the westward of the beaten track, into the boundless desert. Several of my camels were intercepted by the Arabs, and my men suffered cruelly from missing a well: but falling in soon after with the Nubian caravan, our distress was relieved, though at the expense of half my remaining treasure. At last, after performing a prodigious circuit, during which we experienced incredible hardships, we contrived to reach Es-souan, and joined the exiled beys Ismail and Hassan.

Never had the insurgents, even when in most open hostility with the chiefs of Cairo, formed a common cause with the party in the Saïd. Too deeply rooted a jealousy divided the houses of Mohammed and of Aly. The first and only attempt at a union of interests was that which followed the battle of the Mokhadem, and was foiled by the reconciliation of which I became the victim. At enmity now with every party in the capital, I was well received by the beys of Upper Egypt. I confirmed to them the welcome intelligence of the capitan-pasha's preparations, and engaged soon to return with Ismail to Cairo. Meantime, apprehending that I might, in spite of appearances, be deemed a spy only upon the ex-schaich-el-belled, I made over to him my few remaining mamlukes, and, rid of this burthen, determined to withdraw from Egypt, until the grand admiral should actually be on his way. Having, however, still some goods and valuables, I kept my design a secret, lest my kind friends should make my property a keepsake. After a few short rambles, to wean them by degrees from the pleasure of seeing me, I at last undertook a longer flight. On a fine starlight night, of which there is no lack near the cataracts, accompanied only by two trusty servants, mounted like myself on dromedaries, we slipped away, and again plunged into the desert.

By a forced march I reached Gieneh. Its kiachef had formerly been my friend, and what deserves to be recorded, still showed himself my well-wisher. He gave me letters for his lieutenant at Aidab. I travelled across the sands to this seaport, by the Franks called Cosseir, and found its road full of zâims* from Djedda, freighted for Suez, but which had lost the season. One of them I engaged to carry me across the Red Sea; and bidding Egypt, with its plagues as well as its blessings—its mud and misery, its locusts and lizards, as well as its perfumed rice and purple dates, its golden grapes and azure Nileh—a reluctant adieu, with heavy heart embarked.

The vessel was wretched, and the passage stormy; but after expecting to founder on every coral reef in our way, we at last providentially ran safe into Djedda harbour. On stepping, after so many perils by land and by water, on the Arab shore, I could not help exclaiming, "My native land has renounced me; the country of my adoption has cast me off: be thou, O strange soil, the wanderer's less fickle friend!"

I had left a storm gathering in Egypt, of which I since have thanked God I witnessed not the bursting. Already, previous to my departure, the consequences of the scarcity had begun to appear in many places: but it was only after I left the country that the famine attained its full force; and such was, in spite of every expedient of human wisdom, or appeal to Divine mercy, the progressive fury of the scourge, that at last the schaichs and other regular ministers of worship,—supposing the Deity to have become deaf to their entreaties or incensed at their presumption,—no longer themselves ventured to implore offended Heaven, and henceforth only addressed the Almighty through the interceding voices of tender infants; in hopes that, though callous to the suffering of corrupt man, Providence still might listen to the supplications of untainted childhood, and grant to the innocent prayers of babes what it denied to the agonizing cry of beings hardened in sin. Led by the imams to the tops of the highest minarets, little creatures from five to ten years of age there raised to Heaven their pure hands and feeble voices; and while all the countless myriads of Cairo, collected round the foot of these lofty structures, observed a profound and mournful silence, they alone were heard to lisp from their slender summits entreaties for Divine mercy. Nor did even they continue to implore a fertility, which no longer could save the thousands of starving wretches already in the pangs of death. They only begged that a general pestilence might speedily deliver them from their lingering and painful agony; and when from the gilded spires throughout every district of the immense Masr, thousands of infantine voices went forth the same instant to implore the same sad boon, the whole vast population below, with half-extinguished voices, jointly answered, "So be it!"

The humble request God in his mercy granted. The plague followed the scarcity, and the contagion completed what the famine had begun. The human form was swept away from the surface of the land, like the shadows of darkness which the dawn puts to flight. Towns, and villages, and hamlets innumerable were bereft of their tenants to a man. The living became too few to bury the dead. Their own houses remained their cemeteries. Where long strings of coffins at first had issued forth, not a solitary funeral any longer appeared. Hundreds of families, who had fled from famine to Syria, were overtaken by the plague in the midst of their journey, and with their dead bodies marked their route through the desert. Egypt, smitten by the two-fold visitation, almost ceased to appear inhabited; and both plagues at last disappeared for want of further victims to slay.

CHAPTER XXII.

I WAS near the Holy City, and had all my time at my disposal. Could it be better employed than in seizing so favourable an opportunity of acquiring the title and the prerogatives of a hadjee? I therefore determined to perform in its utmost strictness the pilgrimage imposed on all true believers; and no sooner had set foot on shore at Djedda, than I immediately proceeded on to Mekkah, where I achieved in solitude my first round of devotions at the Kaaba.† It is true that, as on this globe at least the holiest places are not always the most agreeable, I again returned as fast back to Djedda; but it was only to wait until the coorban bayram‡ should bring together at Mekkah the whole assemblage of caravans and pilgrims; when I purposed to revisit the ruby of Paradise, and to join the great body of hadjees in the more solemn rites performed at that period under its shadow.

Even in the busier seaport of Djedda itself, it must be owned, my pursuits scarce soared above the amusements of a paltry coffee-house, where I went every morning to smoke my pipe, drink my cup of kishr,§ and play my game of chess with a famous hand from Surat; always hoping to return my adversary's infallible checkmate. These harmless pastimes were varied by a turn on the quay to see the unlading of goods and monsters from the Red Sea; and by the monotonous tales of a poor schaiich of the neighbourhood, who, for my paras, procured me, if not any very delightful waking visions, at least some very sound naps.

An accidental rencounter with an inhabitant of Djedda, Sidi Malek, for whom I had recovered at Cairo some property purloined by Hassan's people on their visit to this city, promised me a little change of scene. Our first meeting was in the street. "I knew," exclaimed Malek on seeing me, "that this would be a day of rejoicing! The word Allah, heard the first thing in the morning, never fails to bring good fortune! I shall not, however, think mine complete until you leave your okkal, and take up your abode under my roof." So easy a mode of making my friend happy I could not in conscience decline. I collected my things, and followed Malek to his habitation.

My acceptance of the sidi's hospitalities, however, soon turned out a greater burthen than I suspected. According to Derwish, the stargazer at Constantinople, whom I left meditating how to undermine the aqueduct, it was only the most distinguished among the heavenly bodies that troubled themselves about the fate of man: but in the opinion of Malek, every stone, beast, and plant on the surface of the earth presumed to meddle with our destiny. Nothing animated or inanimate could be named which exerted not over our being a mysterious influence. From every occurrence, however trivial, some omen might be extracted, if one only knew the way; and that way my friend Malek was determined to find out, cost what it might. Not that in the course of his research he ever dreamed of looking for such connexions between cause and effect as must arise from the intrinsic nature of things and the palpable relationships between divers objects of the creation: such a course would have been derogatory to the dignity of his pursuit. His science only admitted what was totally out of the course of nature and beyond the reach of human understanding. The occult virtues which Malek sought in objects were always precisely those which common sense would never have hit upon. Every secret agency was to have in it something savouring of a prodigy, which chance alone could disclose. Accordingly, the less foundation there appeared for a peculiar belief, the more pertinaciously Malek clung to it; and while he looked upon men of real science—astronomers, physicians, and mathematicians—as paltry geniuses who could not penetrate beyond the surface of things, he considered astrologers, jugglers, and mountebanks as the only men of real and sublime talents. To Aristotle and Galen he would probably have given but an indifferent reception, but the most errant fortuneteller might under his roof call for whatever he pleased. His house was a sort of asylum for all decayed mountebanks. One party out of gratitude for his kindness recommended another: and though in other respects rather a strict Mohammedan, Sidi Malek immediately made a favourite of every dirty Jew, Gentile, or Christian who had the least pretensions to occult knowledge. The impostor ever found a hearty welcome while he condescended to accept of the sidi's hospitalities, and never was dismissed without a handsome viaticum. "Because weak man happens to err in one particular, can he be right in no other?" Malek used to ask; and on the strength of this truth, he believed every lie that was uttered.

While merely theoretical, these opinions might have been entertaining enough; but reduced into practice, they rendered Malck's society very irksome. His own conversation was incoherent, mysterious, and often unintelligible; and he took it much amiss when his friends wished to converse on what they understood. On the least appearance of incredulity with respect to his favourite tenets, his passion knew no bounds. Always on the watch for every chance word or gesture that might be construed into a prognostic either good or bad, he was constantly floating between idle hopes and silly fears, and conceived the strangest predilections or the most unfounded antipathies. My nose unfortunately had a curve which promised uncommon capabilities for the occult sciences if but properly cultivated; and Malek determined they should not lie fallow for want of any pains which he could bestow.

The sidi's stationary oracle was a soothsayer of established repute, residing in one of the remotest suburbs of Djedda, and who seldom condescended to visit from home, but waited to be worshipped in his own cave or temple. For the sake of peace I suffered myself to be conducted to this personage, the odour of whose fame, I was told, extended all the world over. It might be so: and certain it is that I was nearly suffocated on entering his den. To say the truth, however, this sanctuary smelt more of things below than of the stars above; but I had promised to introduce myself, and accordingly groped my way till I reached the inmost recesses of the unsavoury abode.-

There I found the wizard seated in state on an old clothes-chest. A stuffed crocodile canopied his head; a serpent's skin of large dimensions was spread under his feet. On every part of the wall glittered potent charms and formidable spells. They had their names written over them for the information of the beholder, and hair of unborn dives,* heart of maiden vipers, liver of the bird roc,† fat of dromedary's haunch, and bladders filled with the wind simoom,‡ were among the least rare and curious. Of the wizard's own form and features so little was discernible that I almost doubted whether he had any. An immense pair of spectacles filled up all the space between his cloak and his turban. These spectacles were in constant motion, like a weathercock, from left to right and from right to left, between a celestial globe robbed of half its constellations by the worms, and a Venice almanac despoiled of half its pages by the wear and tear of fingers. Before the astrologer lay expanded his table of nativities.

Opposite the master shone with a reflected light his apprentice, crouched, like a marmoset, on a low stool. This youth, with his little pair of round sparkling eyes immoveably fixed on his principal, sat watching all his gestures, and never stirred from his station except to hand him his compasses, to turn his globe, or to pick up his spectacles, which for want of the support of a nose, came off every moment. After each of these evolutions he immediately ran back to his pedestal, and resumed his immoveable attitude until the next call for his activity. So complete a silence was maintained all the time on both sides, that one would have sworn every motion of this pantomime must have been preconcerted.

Fearful of disturbing the influence of some planet, or confusing the calculations of some nativity, I myself remained a while silent and motionless at the entrance of the sanctuary; but finding that I might stay there till doomsday if I waited for an invitation to advance, I at last grew impatient, marched up to the wizard, put my mouth to his ear, and roared out as loud as I could,—“I suppose I am addressing the learned Schaich-Aly!”

Upon this the astrologer gave a start like one suddenly roused from some profound meditation, turned his head slowly round, as if it moved by clockwork, and after first leisurely surveying me several times from head to foot, and again from foot to head, at last said, in a snuffling but emphatic tone, drawling every word in order to make what was not short in itself longer still,—“If you mean the celebrated Schaich Abou Saleeh, Ibn-Mohammed, Ibn-Aly el Djeddawee el Schafei, schaich of the flowery mosque and the cream of the astrologers of the age, who holds familiar converse with the stars, and to whom the moon herself imparts all her secrets,—I am he!”

“And if you should happen to want the best beloved of the pupils of this luminary of the world, the young bud of the science of which he is the full-blown pride, the nascent dawn of his meridian splendour,” added from his pedestal the little marmoset,—“I am he!”

“Hail,” answered I, “to the full-blown pride of astrology, and hail to its nascent bud! May they be pleased to inform me what I am, whence I come, whither I am going, and whether or not I may hope to recover what I have lately lost?”

“Young man,” replied the wizard, “you lump together a heap of questions, each of which, singly, would take a twelvemonth to answer at length. Besides, it is not in my own person I inform people of such things. You cannot be ignorant that the voice of prophecy has ceased with the holy one of Mekkah. I am but the humble interpreter of the stars. It is true, that my vast knowledge of these celestial oracles enables me to understand their language as clearly as my mother tongue; and that is what enables me to know to a tittle all that was, and is, and is to be. I therefore may forthwith, if you please, ascertain from the chance opening of the holy book, in what way the heavenly bodies choose to be interrogated.”

I agreed. The doctor performed his ablutions, and the dawn of his meridian splendour shook the dust off his gown. Thus cleansed, at least externally, he mumbled a prayer or two, and then with great solemnity opened the Koran.

"Child," said he, after having inspected the page, "the admirable and important chapter on which Providence has willed the eye of its servant to fall, treats of the balance Wézn.* This proves in the clearest manner—but, ere I proceed further, what do you mean to pay me?"

"Two piastres," was my answer, thinking this a handsome remuneration. Not so the wizard: the most grievous of insults could not have put him into a greater rage. "Two piastres!" exclaimed he; "why, in the quietest of times, and when a man's fortune might almost be told him blindfold, this would scarce have been an aspre each adventure; and now that the world is all turned topsy-turvy, that men do not know whether they stand on their heads or heels; now that women wage war, kings turn philosophers, and high-priests stroll about the country; now that the grand lama of Tibet takes a turn to Pekin, and the pope of Rome travels post to Vienna, to offer such a fee!—insolent, absurd, preposterous!"

I let the astrologer's passion cool a little first, and then resumed the negotiation. After a good deal of altercation, it ended in Ibn-Mohammed, Ibn-Aly el Schafeï, undertaking to reveal my destiny in two days, for the important sum of one sequin.

At the appointed time I returned, but found not Schaich-Aly, as before, in solitary meditation. He stood surrounded by a whole line of customers; and one he was abusing with such intemperance as seemed to terrify all the rest, and make them apprehend their own fortunes would fare the worse for the incident. "Wretch!" he cried; "to apply to me for charms to rid your house of vermin, as if I was in league with vipers and with scorpions! Go to the wandering santons that ply in the crossways, and presume not again to appear in the presence of one whom the very skies treat with reverence."

The frightened peasant retired, and the remainder received the devout and wonderful sentences, which only required being kept carefully sealed up to procure the bearer every species of bliss.

The levee thus despatched, the wizard turned to me. "I have completed your business," cried he, handing me a dirty scrawl. "But it has been with incredible toil. I cannot conceive what you have done to the stars. At the bare mention of your name they all began to laugh. It has cost me a whole night's labour to bring them to their senses. Instead of one sequin, I ought to have a dozen."

"Not one single aspre," replied I, glancing over the paper, and throwing it in the wizard's face. "The beginning informs me that I shall certainly die young provided I do not grow old, and cannot fail to marry unless I die single; and as to the end, it has no meaning at all!"

"It has a great deal of meaning," replied the now infuriated stargazer; "for it means that you certainly will be hanged."

"It then also means," replied I, "that I need not pay a farthing; for if I am not hanged you have written a parcel of lies, undeserving of a fee; and if I am equally to swing whether I pay or not, I may as well save my money and give you a drubbing into the bargain." So saying, I laid on; and the young bud of science, who tried to protect his master, came in for his share of my bounty. All intercourse with the constellations now being at an end, I walked off, threatened alternately with the justice of the stars, and with that of the cadée.

I thought it best to tell Malek at once how I had behaved to his astrologer. He began to think less favourably of my docility, and our friendship somewhat cooled. Fortunately, the season of the festivals was at hand, and I returned to Mekkah, to witness the arrival of the pilgrims.

At Cairo I had viewed the departure of the caravan from the Birket-el-hadj,* as a species of public rejoicing. The whole of the night which preceded the raising of the tents, the camp, resplendent with the light of millions of lamps, and re-echoing with the sound of thousands of musical instruments, seemed the special abode of mirth and pleasure; and the ensuing morning the pilgrims, fresh, gay, full of ardour, and prancing along the road, looked like a procession of the elect going to take possession of Paradise.

Alas! how different was the appearance of this same caravan, after a long and fatiguing march across the desert, on its arrival at Mekkah! Wan, pale, worn out with fatigue and thirst, incrustated with a thick coat of dust and perspiration, they who composed it seemed scarce able to crawl to the place of their destination. The end of their journey looked like that of their earthly existence; or rather, one might have fancied their bodies already smitten by the spirit of the desert, and their ghosts come disembodied to accomplish their vow.

Among the arrivals were some of my Egyptian friends; but their sufferings had so altered them, that they were obliged to syllable their names, ere I could bring their persons to my recollection. One had almost lost his eyesight, another scarce preserved a remnant of his before slender intellect, and a third was, in consequence of constant alarms, become subject to such spasmodic movements, that he believed himself obliged to hold his head fast by the ears, lest it should turn round like a top on his body!

The holy house of Mekkah offers nearly the same difference from that of Loretto, which the Mussulman character does from that of the Franks. Everybody knows the Santa Casa to be a whirligig sort of thing, which in its roving disposition, changed its abode half a dozen times before it could finally settle. The Kaaba, on the contrary, is a steady, demure sort of a house, which, from the day the angels placed it where it stands, never manifested the least inclination to move. Accordingly, even Mohammed dared not meddle with its well-established reputation. It firmly stood its ground in spite of his reform, and to this day remains the chief object of the worship of his followers.

Seven times I walked round the holy pile in full procession, and seven times kissed the black stone, which the angel Gabriel brought from paradise (I did not inquire why) to figure in its south-west corner. I next went to the valley of Menah to renounce Satan and his works, by flinging a pebble over my left shoulder; nor did I fail to fill a pitcher with the brackish water of the well Zem-zem, to quench the thirst of the soul. But what I prized beyond all other things were the parings of the besom that had swept the tabernacle, which I purchased from the Sherce of Mekkah,* to cleanse the impurities of the heart, and which, if mine were not all wiped away, failed of doing its duty.

My spiritual concerns thus attended to, I turned to my temporal affairs, and made an exchange of some of the property which I brought from Egypt, for other and more suitable articles; for, be it known, that the festivals of the holy house end in a fair, held in the innumerable tents that encircle it like a girdle, and which brings together merchants and goods from the most opposite extremities of the old hemisphere—very properly making even the worship of Manimon contribute to support the temple of the Lord.

From Mekkah I proceeded with the whole body of the pilgrims to Medinah, a place somewhat less holy, but infinitely more agreeable. There (still intent on deeds of holiness) I bargained for a little bit of the fringe which had adorned the prophet's tomb; but found the unconscionable vender ask a price I scarce would have given for Mohammed's own two front teeth, kept in the holy treasury at Constantinople. Fringeless, therefore, I went on to Damascus, with the principal division of the caravan, headed by the celebrated miscreant Djezzar,* pasha of Acre.

No extraordinary events that year signalized the homeward journey of the hadj;† for I reckon not as such the hundreds of camels that died every day of fatigue on the road, to the great annoyance of the Schaich of Sardieh who furnished them, and to the great delight of his loyal subjects, who cut them up and ate them; and still less do I reckon as such the thousands of pilgrims that gave up the ghost from the same cause, to the annoyance I fear of no one but themselves; and to the unspeakable satisfaction of the conducting pasha, to whom their property devolved.

For my own part, as I observed mortality to be, somehow, rifest among the richest pilgrims, and was still possessed of some valuable luggage myself, I continued during the whole of the journey particularly careful of my health. I ate no made dishes, knowing them to be heating; and abstained from brewed beverage, as apt to attack the bowels: but preferred the simplest fare, however coarse, and drank plain water, though ever so muddy. By means of this regimen I escaped, thank God ! all the bad effects of the journey. A more difficult task than that of avoiding the consequence of the climate was in my opinion that of eluding the overpowering attentions of the Bosniac guard* of the Emir Hadj. These gentlemen were paid for protecting the property of the pilgrims, and it is but doing them justice to say, they could scarcely have acted otherwise than they did if it had been their own. A delibash† of the pasha in particular, used to show such solicitude about my equipage, that not one article of it would have escaped his vigilance, or been suffered to remain out of his box, had I not, early in the business, bethought myself of recommending to him, as more worthy his attention, the luggage of a wealthy Turkish merchant, which, infinitely heavier, assuredly much more required being lightened.

The only one of my companions whom I trusted was a Cypriote. Like myself a Greek by birth, he had like me embraced Islamism from choice ; but with this difference, that love had been my motive, revenge his. He had turned Mohammedan for the sole purpose of being qualified to return to another Mohammedan, without breach of etiquette, the favour of a drubbing. No sooner was he admitted into the bosom of Islamism, than he ran to discharge the debt ; and paid it with such ample interest, that his creditor was never heard to utter a single syllable of complaint. To do penance for this petulance, as he said ; or, rather, to withdraw from the scene of this achievement, as I believe, he undertook the pilgrimage. From Cyprus he embarked for Jaffa, from Jaffa crossed over to Suez, and at Suez took shipping with a flotilla of hadjees bound for Djedda. "Huddled together so thick," said he, "that we found not room to lie down, in boats so rotten that we expected to split on every coral reef on which our ignorant sailors chose to run, I never expected to reach land again ; and I do not know whether I owe my being saved from a watery grave to Mohammed or to the Virgin ; as, for fear of a mistake, I addressed my prayers to both. This, however, I do know, that having once got upon terra-firma again, I mean, please God ! never more to trust myself on the water. I have conceived such a horror of that element, that Mohammedan, and, what is more, hadjee as I now am, I can scarce prevail upon myself to drink a drop of any thing but wine."

My friend Mahmood, however, was destined more justly to appreciate the comforts of travelling on dry land, when a three weeks' journey across the sands of Arabia had killed off with fatigue and heat about a fourth of our caravan. Almost become transparent with loss of flesh, he now swore he would rather a thousand times be swallowed up at once by a wave, than be mummified by inches.

On entering the pashalik of Damascus the scene changed completely. Each league, as we advanced, now brought some improvement in our condition. First came to meet us the supply of fresh provisions from Trabloos; next the convoy from Palestine; and when, soon after, we entered the fertile plains of Hauran, I felt as if ushered at once from the burning bowels of hell into the flowery fields of Elysium. Indeed, on first beholding from a small eminence, after a month's wearisome march, through sands almost red hot, the glassy pool of Mardin, encircled by its verdant banks, such was the fit of hydro—not phobia—but mania, which came upon me, that had I been within reach of the lovely puddle, I would have plunged into it headlong—dress, armour, and all!

The privations of a pilgrimage are not necessary to render Damascus a true paradise. Groves of orange and apricot and plum trees imbosom its walls, limpid fountains sparkle in all its habitations; and so much did its beauties, animate and inanimate, its exquisite confectionary, and its cool sherbet delight my eye and palate, that I purposed making it my abode, until I should hear further of the high admiral's motions. Purified by my pilgrimage, I thought I could afford to run up a new score of little peccadilloes; and though in the course of three weeks I saw the forty thousand hadjees with whom I had entered Damascus again disappear almost to a man, I still continued without the smallest intention of stirring, until I found that I had reckoned without my host—I mean without Djezzar, the eternal pasha.

One Friday morning, after my devotions, just as I stepped out of the mosque, my eye happened to be caught by one of those celestial beings, found in large cities, who, anticipating the office of the houris of paradise, have no objection to cast a ray of bliss on the existence of mortal man. Unfortunately, my eagerness to pursue the rapid motion of the flitting form of brightness made me overlook some nearer but less attractive objects, which stood in my way. Foremost among these happened to be a little man, who, walking up the steps of the mosque, just as I rushed down, was so much below my line of sight, directed straight forward, that I only perceived his proximity by the violence with which I came in contact with his person, and occasioned his downfall. I should more properly have said, his fear of a downfall; since I had the address to catch him in my arms, and to twirl him round like a top, so as to break the force of the shock, and only to lay him neatly down on his seat upon the steps, without having received the smallest injury.

Great as was my hurry, I felt unable to proceed until I had looked round, as one always does, to see whom I thus had disposed of in the least disagreeable manner I could help. I found it to be a personage dressed after the Turkish fashion indeed, but evidently, in the very Christianlike manner in which his Mohammedan apparel was huddled on, a Frank in disguise. In short, I had run foul of an inquisitive traveller, come to have a sly peep at a mosque noted in the empire for being kept peculiarly sacred from the intrusion of infidels; and who certainly expected not his curiosity to meet with so providential a punishment.

I always piqued myself upon my good breeding, especially to strangers: and I felt particularly anxious to display it to one who might report of me in Franguestan. For which reason I turned back, and laying hold of the short person of the traveller in the readiest way for righting it, namely, by the ample folds of his nether man—I lifted him up like an oil jar, and so set him on end again; at the same time reversing his position for the benefit of his curiosity, and turning his face towards the entrance of the mosque which he was come to view.

I do not know by what strange bias in his mind, to be pushed down should have appeared to him a misfortune to be borne with, while to be set on his legs again was taken for an indignity, which called for every expression of the most outrageous resentment. Perhaps it was from the superiority of size and strength it implied on my part. But so it was; and instead of thanks for an act of which my hurry still increased the merit, I got nothing for my pains but abuse, the more galling since the courtesy which caused it had made me lose sight of the object of my pursuit. It is true, that in his passion my traveller resorted for his epithets to the German tongue; but I had learned with my friends at Pera the fundamental words of that language, and perfectly understood every term of commendation he was pleased to bestow. I therefore ran back, and, in order to undo what I had obtained so little gratitude for doing, again gently laid him down upon his seat as before, in the very place from which I had raised him; at the same time begging his pardon for my presumption in having lent my unwelcome assistance to rectify his position. A fat friar of the Latin hospice tolerated at Damascus, who accompanied the stranger through the city as cicerone, but had prudently kept aloof while his guest made the attempt on the mosque, saw from a distance the last operation, and not knowing the cause, took it into his head that I was ill treating his friend; upon which he ran to his rescue.

Padre Giacomo happened—from some private cause or other, connected by the Damascenes with the magic art—to be in great estimation with the pasha; and thence had the confidence to abuse me in his turn, not like the traveller, in an outlandish language, but in good Arabic, intelligible to every bystander. This materially altered the case. To be thus, in the midst of Damascus, and in the hearing of a numerous audience, publicly insulted, and that by a capuchin, was not to be borne. “See,” cried I, therefore, to the mob, “what it is to have an old woman for a sultan, who grants firmans to Christian dogs” (my politeness had by this time given way a little), “to come and spy disguised in our own dress the nakedness of our land! But glory be to the prophet, and down with the Yaoors!”

“Yes, down with the Yaoors; and let us go and drown them,” answered the ready mob.

This proposal even exceeded my wishes. But once I had saved a Jew from a watery grave, and I thought I might have equal success with a brace of Christians. “No, no,” cried I, therefore, “the Arabs would think that inhospitable. Let us only disable these infidels from passing themselves off for Mussulmans, by stripping them of their mustachios and their beard. They will look as ridiculous again when shaved, as they would do merely drowned.” So thought the mob. My friends consequently were taken to the nearest barber, seated, lathered, shaved, and dismissed.

But the bristles of the capuchin's beard were fated to become thorns in my side. The pasha took up the affair. He could neither bear to be without his friend the friar, nor to see him in his presence with a beardless chin. I very soon got hints of the unwholesomeness of the Damascus air; and of all physicians, I wished least for Djezzar to be let blood by. Having picked up a good number of the country swordblades, remarkable for their fine temper, I resolved to convert my steel into gold in the capital. There also I should be more in the way of watching the grand admiral's motions; and I doubted not that an ex-kiachef hostile to Ibrahim and Mourad would easily obtain rank in the sultan's army. I therefore packed up my little property, and the very evening after the warning slept at Salieh.

The next morning I proceeded with a caravan to Tra-bloos, and there embarked for Stamboul on board a vessel from Alexandria. The cargo consisted of black slaves. The richest article was a little negro, who had been furnished with his passport for the harem by an old Coobd in the Saïd, purveyor to my patron Suleiman. Though the only one of twenty who had escaped alive, poor little blacky looked very unhappy. To console him, I used to prognosticate his becoming some day kislar-aga, when he would have all the beauties of the seraglio under his command! "Alas!" answered he, "of what use will it be to me?" "Of what use?" I replied. "Why to whip them, to be sure; and so to vent your spleen!"

CHAPTER XXIII.

A CERTAIN number of years had now elapsed since I left Mavroyeni; and changes more potent than even those which time effects had taken place in my circumstances since that period. I was not only from a boy become a man, but from a Greek a Mohammedan, and from a person of no note whatever an individual who had filled no inconsiderable character in the world's drama. I had acted a part both in negotiation and in warfare. I no longer either thought myself an inferior to the drogue-man of the arsenal, or stood in need of his protection. It was doubtless for the latter reason that, when arrived at Constantinople, I no longer felt any hesitation to call at his door. Little acquainted, however, with the revolutions which might have happened in a place so fertile in storms as the Fanar, I thought it prudent, ere I ventured upon my visit, to collect some information respecting my old patron, lest, seeking his abode too abruptly, I should be conducted to a burying-ground or a dungeon.

"Friend," answered the old messmate to whom I addressed my inquiries, "Mavroyeni is no longer to be found at the arsenal."

"I understand," replied I; and motioned with my hand, as if to say, "he is shortened by the part above the neck."

"Not yet," resumed my informer, "but in a fair way of being so. He is at present Hospodar of Valachia."

"Hospodar of Valachia!" exclaimed I, starting back at least three paces. "What! Nicholas Mavroyeni,—a mere man of the islands, a rank Tooshan!—has he then at last been able to wriggle himself into the fairest of the two Greek provinces; and that, in the very teeth of every Ipsilandi, Morosi, Callimacqui, and Souzzo whom the Fanar could muster to oppose his invasion?"

"He has," rejoined Notara. "After having been, during fifteen years and upwards, regularly threatened every day at the Terzhaneh, by the grand admiral, with being kicked out of office, he has only left the place of drogue-man of the fleet, to step into the very highest situation which a Greek can attain in the Turkish empire; and that, without any stipulation for the purchase of the principality, without any compromise as to the length of his tenure, without any restriction or engagement as to the persons he was to promote. Fettered by no clause or limitation whatsoever, he has distanced all his rivals, and swept away the whole stake single handed."

I begged my friend to inform me how this miracle had been accomplished.

"You must remember," replied he, "that Russia never acted with more hostility towards Turkey than after the peace. But the Muscovites were governed by a man in petticoats, and we ruled by old women in turbans. Haleel-Hamid Vizier, and after him Shaheen-Aly Vizier, seemed determined to abide every insult of the northern virago. At last, however, the interview between Joseph and Catharine opened the sultan's eyes. Abd-ool-Hammed felt that his sacrifices would not preserve peace, and must diminish the chance of a successful war. He dismissed the pacific Shaheen, and looked about for a more enterprising and warlike vizier. The only one in the whole empire that could be found to suit his views was Youssoof, the water-carrier of Smyrna, the caleondgee of the fleet, the counsellor and right-hand of the capitan-pasha, the defender of the Boghaz against the Russians, the moohasseel of the Morea, and, finally, the supreme vizier of the Othoman empire.

"Youssoof, in his turn, felt the necessity of confiding the government of a province so important and so much exposed as Valachia to none but a man of resolution and bravery. Such a one was not to be found among the merchant-princes of the Fanar. But such a one he knew his old comrade in the service of the capitan-pasha, Mavroyeni, to be. He therefore proposed him. In vain did all the Fanariotes for once cordially unite to prevent his nomination. In vain did they put forward their tool, Petracki, the seraff* of the mint. This zealous agent might spend more money to prevent an election to a principality than ever had been wasted to obtain one! it availed nothing! Mavroyeni was invested; and when in the act of receiving at the hands of the supreme vizier the marks of his dignity, he begged, as the single favour which was wanting to complete his bliss, the head of the seraff; that boon also was granted. On going out of the audience-chamber—by way of a delicate attention—Petracki's bleeding head was made to roll at his feet.

"Mavroyeni is now gone, in the fulness of his glory, to take possession of his principality. Perhaps, however, what he regarded as the last testimonial of his elevation may prove the first step to his downfall. It is secretly whispered that the late Sultan Mustapha had confided several millions of piastres to Petracki for the use of his son Selim, during the reign of Abd-ool-hammed his brother. This deposit is necessarily involved in the general fate of the seraff's confiscated property. But Selim some day must come to the throne, and he will not fail to remember the loss he sustained through Mavroyeni."

* Seraff—cashier, banker.

On hearing all this, my first impulse was to pay the patron of my youth a visit in his principality: but my second thoughts presented my stake in Egypt as the one most worth following up. However, the capitan-pasha being as yet far from ready for his expedition, I determined, in the mean time, to indulge the supreme pleasure of the Italians; the fur niente.

At Chio an intimacy had long subsisted between my father and another Greek merchant, by name Mavrocordato. His extraction was honourable: friends traced his pedigree to a younger branch of the imperial Palæologi: history allowed him the later and more certain honour of being related to princes of Valachia; the first of whom, invested by the Porte, bore the same name. He was a man of most respectable character: nay, while burthened with so numerous a family, that the most rigorous parsimony could only ensure to each of its members a very moderate provision, he even enjoyed the reputation of being particularly liberal, and seemed contented, so the expenses of the twelvemonth did not exceed the comings in of the year. But, strange to tell! no sooner had he, through a fatal contagion, lost all his children save one, in whom consequently was to centre his whole inheritance, than a total revolution took place in his conduct. The possibility of leaving this only heir extremely opulent now for the first time seizing hold of his imagination, gave it a new bias, and bred a desire for riches, before unfelt. He who, while in moderate circumstances, had been generous to a proverb, now all at once when he saw his hoard accumulate, became saving, retrenched many of the innocent luxuries in which he formerly indulged, and began to toil for the acquirement of superfluous wealth, with a devotion often before sharply censured in others by himself, while only possessed of a sufficiency. Still, however, he was at no time suspected of increasing his gains by dishonourable means, nor could he be accused of sordid avarice. He might be said to live below his income, but he ranked not among those imbecile misers who, during their lifetime, starve the very heir whom they destine at their death to revel in their riches. No expense was spared for the education of Spiridion; and even for the pleasures of this beloved son Mavrocordato would often exceed his own notions of discretion.

The intimacy between Mavrocordato and my father had produced an habitual intercourse between Spiridion and myself. It could not be called friendship—it was scarce even entitled to the appellation of companionship: for there existed between us a difference of two years—a prodigious one at our age—and sufficient to make me look upon the son of Mavrocordato as by no means fit to join in my sports. Our connexion might be described as composed of protectorship on my part, and of deference on that of Spiridion. I led him in my train, spoke to him in a tone of authority, and gave myself the airs of his tutor. The sag of the party when I associated with boys of my own standing, my protégé was only allowed to contribute to my pastimes when I found myself destitute of other resource. But flattered by being admitted in any form under my auspices to the diversions of his older playmates, Spiridion asked not for more, contemplated me with sentiments of veneration, felt honoured by my commands, and executed all my high behests with a zeal and promptitude amounting to perfect devotion. To employ in my concerns any other boy but him was on my part a sign of displeasure, and to himself a subject of mortification. It was he who, whenever we went on a marauding expedition, was sent forward as a scout to explore the ground; who, when we stripped an orchard, kept watch until we had secured the booty; and who, whatever exploit we engaged in, generally paid the penalty, while we carried off the fruits. But the sufferings he earned in our service he ever bore most manfully, and his firmness in submitting to any punishment rather than betray our confidence was truly heroic. In return, I always sustained my part as his protector; defended him against every other boy, allowed none of my comrades to assume over him the least authority, and would have made any one who, in my presence, had presumed to correct him, long remember the castigation which would have followed such an offence.

Still, however, spite of the public countenance with which I honoured Mavrocordato's son, the father would not have grieved to have seen us less together. For a time he kept us as much asunder as his own frequent intercourse with my own sire would permit: but an event took place, which, in the midst of all Mavrocordato's attempts to dissolve us, riveted our friendship more closely than ever.

I had headed a large troop of my companions in a swimming party, when one of the lesser boys, spying some way off a small boat upon the beach, set it afloat, leaped in with Spiridion, and rowed out to a considerable distance. Suddenly there arose a violent squall. The truants grew frightened, they lost their presence of mind, mismanaged the boat, and overset it. Much fatigued with a good hour's splashing in the water, I had just finished putting on my clothes, when a universal shout of terror made me raise my eyes, and see the two children struggling with the waves!

Spiridion's companion was a tolerable swimmer, and rapidly approached the beach. No one felt the least alarm for him: but Spiridion himself, who had laid hold of an oar for support, seemed on the point of sinking. Already encumbered with my clothes, I called out to my still naked companions to jump in and save my charge. "Who dares?" was all the answer I got.

Dressed as I was, I now myself plunged into the sea, swam to Spiridion, and succeeded in throwing to him one end of my sash, while I held the other fast between my teeth. Supporting the child in this way, I tried to regain the beach. It was still a good way off, when some of my comrades seeing me appear faint and overwhelmed with my load, at last took courage, and threw themselves into the water to swim to my assistance. But I had got too far unassisted to accept of their tardy succour, and resolved to achieve the task alone, or perish in the attempt. Collecting all my remaining strength, I pushed away my officious playmates, and invoking my protecting saints, strained every still obedient nerve for a final exertion. It exceeded my powers: held back by the weight of Spiridion, I felt myself sinking. In this situation was I, by a perseverance which could do my friend no good, to share his untimely end? or by abandoning him at least to save my own life?—Reason, I suppose, would have said, "Save yourself."

Luckily, the dilemma never struck me. I had resigned myself to death, when an enormous billow, which only seemed advancing to swallow us up, flung me upon a shoal just hidden by the waves, of which I had no knowledge. I found means with one arm to cling to the rock, while with the other I grasped my poor Spirro. Thus we remained above water, until a boat, which just before had put off to meet me, reached the reef, took us in, and brought us on shore.

Mavrocordato happened to walk with my father on the quay when the accident took place. Apprized of his son's danger, he had arrived in sight, half-frantic with terror, just as, floundering on the waves, I threw out my sash to Spiridion. He had gone through all the agonies of every subsequent crisis, until he saw us safely landed on the beach. Immediately he ran, or rather flew to the spot, and even before he noticed his child clasped me convulsively in his arms, as the saviour both of the son and the father.

These expressions died away on my ear. Exhausted with fatigue, I had fainted, and lay half an hour like one completely dead, ere I recovered. But on being brought to myself again, I still found Mavrocordato busy by my side, ministering to my relief, while poor Spirro was drenching my cold features with his tears.

As soon as his father saw me able to understand him, he resumed his boundless thanks, only interrupting them to lay on his son a most positive injunction, never to treat me otherwise than as a brother; and in the face of all around, and of Heaven itself, he took a solemn engagement, strengthened by every most sacred oath, henceforth to consider me as his second child. "Happen what may, Anastasius," he cried, sobbing with emotion, "rest secure that I shall never abandon you;" and, indeed, from that day Mavrocordato seemed to have no second object of solicitude (his son always remaining the first), except to palliate my frequent offences. Many a time he redeemed my sins with the sums he would have denied to the gratification of his own fancies; and, had he been at home when the ripening effects of my imprudent conduct made me become a voluntary exile, I might not perhaps have fled as I did from my natural parent and from my adoptive father.

Since my abandonment of home I had lost sight of Mavrocordato and his son. When I wanted assistance most at Constantinople, and might have derived the greatest benefit from the performance of their promise, Mavrocordato happened to be gone on business to Trieste or to Vienna, I did not know which; and just before I went to Chio he had entirely quitted that island—a theatre too confined for his extending concerns—and had come to settle at Stamboul.

In a capital of that description, the love of riches soon begets the love of sway. Mavrocordato, who before only wished to leave his son distinguished for wealth, now aspired at beholding him eminent in rank and dignity. In short, he aimed at nothing less than seeing him some day bey of Valachia or Moldavia; and all his endeavours now tended to forming the requisite connexions at the Fanar. Unfortunately, he had not the lungs which ambition requires. Accustomed to inhale the pure mountain air of Chio, he found the confined atmosphere of the capital ill agree with his health. Accordingly, while he only retained at Constantinople a small recess for business, he bought in the country, close to the beautiful village of Kandilly, the villa of a proscribed vizier for his residence. It was there that, in one of my excursions, chance again threw me in his way.

There were two things in this rencounter which surprised me, and to many will appear incredible. The first was, that Mavrocordato had not toiled like a galley-slave for his son while a boy, only to fall out with him when grown a man; the other, that he did not consider, because nine or ten years had elapsed since I saved that son's life, the natural term of a father's gratitude was wholly expired; nor did he even think that all the promises made to a Christian must fall away on his becoming a Mohammedan. When, indeed, Mavrocordato learned that for reasons good or bad I had changed my religion, he looked a little dismayed; but soon recovering, "The will of God," he cried, "be done!" and invited me not the less as cordially to his mansion as if I could publicly have pledged him in the wine of his own growing. Perhaps a person who in my situation could raise himself to rank, and had found means to save money, might not to a mind of Mavrocordato's prudent cast, after all, appear wholly destitute of some laudable ingredients in his disposition. At least, my host received me as if he had thought so; and the very same day wrote to my father to acquaint him with his rencounter, his pleasure, and his grief.

Many letters between Stambool and Chio, I suspect, are intercepted by the tritons and the nereids, curious to know what passes above water; but Mavrocordato's epistle was left by these submarine gossips to take its course. There even came to it as speedy an answer as the diligence of man could indite, or the breath of a favourably-disposed servant of Æolus waft to its destination. My host was conjured in it, by every tie of ancient friendship and every motive of religion, to spare no pains in recalling a stray sheep into the way of salvation. A postscript, about as long again as the letter, stated that should my abjuration of my errors compel me to quit the Turkish dominions, I should find my wants provided for in whatever nearest part of Christendom I might make my abode. These assurances moved me to tears. "Blessed be my aged parent!" cried I; "when permitted by those that surround him, he still feels anxious for the welfare of his Anastasius." "And so do your brothers," answered old Mavrocordato. "They would rather even that you should return to your faith than to your island. So they write." At this speech a dark cloud again overcast the transient sunshine of my heart.

As to Mavrocordato, he inquired not into the motives; he only considered the merits of the request. At all times he had been religiously inclined, but he had extended the sphere of his devotion since he had contracted that of his liberality. He gave more to God as he gave less to man; no doubt expecting the stake in heaven to bear the higher interest. The arduous and delicate commission intrusted to his prudence he undertook, not as a mere act of duty towards a friend, but as an effectual means of working his own eternal bliss. Had he been offered the nursing of a vizier's estate instead of the rekindling of a Taooshan's extinguished faith, he could not have engaged with more zeal in the business. I believe he would have paid me to become once more a Christian, had I been in want of money; but finding that all I stood in need of was good advice, he determined not to spare it, and only considered how he might best administer the bitter potion, and ensure the most frequent opportunities for such salutary exhortations as all my ingenuity might not enable me to escape. Cunningly, therefore, he bethought himself of making his solicitude for my temporal concerns the means of advancing his spiritual aim; and actually offered to manage my property for me to the best advantage, free of commission and other charges. The thing was worth accepting. I left my casket in Mavrocordato's custody, empowered him to sell its contents to the greatest profit, and to lend out my money at the highest interest; and even yielded, after some little demur, to his pressing invitation to accept of a permanent apartment under his roof.

Still he at first only ventured upon the performance of the task to which all this was preparatory with a very tender hand. He feared to excite my impatience of control or my jealousy of independence, and carefully abstained from all that might savour of the tone of a pedagogue or the authority of a parent. My well-bred host contented himself with throwing out, when opportunities offered, such delicate hints and such roundabout insinuations as left it easy, at my pleasure, either to avoid their hitting, to take off their point, or to let their whole weight fall upon me unnoticed.

At last, however, Mavrocordato began to find out that this over-cautious mode of proceeding did not advance his purpose; accordingly, he resolved upon a more open and undisguised mode of attack. He now on all occasions enlarged upon the reprehensibleness of my conduct, and the danger of my evil courses; constantly represented me as standing on the very brink of perdition; and never met me at home or abroad without significantly shaking his head, uttering a deep groan, and inflicting upon me so vehement a lecture, that whatever he might say, I could never think myself obliged to him for it. This new method, therefore, succeeded still worse than the former. Instead of not minding my host, I now carefully avoided his company. Though still nominally an inmate in his house at Kandilly, I was oftener to be found at the farthest end of Constantinople, and always out in the morning before he came from his office, and seldom returned at night ere he retired to bed; it was but on very extraordinary occasions that I indulged him with a sight of his very discreet guest.

A third plan of operations was then resorted to. In the idea that the son, from less disparity of age and greater means of watching my behaviour, might succeed in the scheme in which his father failed, Mavrocordato now committed the whole labour of my conversion to Spiridion. This undoubtedly evinced a thorough confidence in the steadiness of the youth. Spotless purity itself, unless composed of very hard and impenetrable stuff, might, in the office of cleansing the stains of a mind full of foulness, be supposed to incur some risk of not remaining wholly unsullied.

Independent even of the danger to which the purpose of the father exposed the son, perhaps the son was the person most unfit to forward the design of the father. I do not mean on the score of insufficient interest in my welfare: far from it. In the exuberance of life's early spring, the holy ties of friendship strike root too deeply in the soul, and entwine themselves too closely round every fibre of the heart, to be enfeebled or broken by later separations or storms. The intimacies of that happy epoch, as they precede, also survive all the more interested connexions of a maturer age; and Spiridion's early devotion to the companion of his childhood had not only kindled up anew, but again glowed in his breast with all its former ardour. Spite of my manifold failings, he loved me at Constantinople as he had done at Chio; only the greater scope of his understanding directed not his wishes for my weal to the same point to which tended exclusively the views of his father. If he more than emulated Mavrocordato in his solicitude to see me renounce my old sins, he was far from feeling equal anxiety for my abjuring my new worship.

Spiridion had received from nature an expansive mind. It had resisted all the contracting powers of a narrow education. In vain might its views be obstructed by the opaque blinds of ignorance, its flights impeded by the leaden trammels of prejudice; it could see through the one, and soar above the other. As greater efforts were made to hem in on all sides his powerful faculties, they seemed only to derive superior strength from their concentration, and to break with greater force through their insufficient barriers. While with all his canvass spread to the breeze of the passing hour, the father sailed down the muddy tide of the Fanar, the son would retire to his closet, there to imbibe long draughts of wisdom at the pure spring of philosophy; and as, where literary discourse was despised or was prohibited, he perused not books merely to quote sentences, he had more leisure to ruminate upon the matter, and to digest the contents of his volumes. Hence his understanding rose far above his age and country; for in those days modern Greece had not yet attained that miraculous emancipation from the bondage of error and superstition, of which, I understand, the P—'s and the C—'s of the present more enlightened period boast in their recent publications; and in the thick darkness which surrounded him, Spiridion was almost the only person I could have named who attached more importance to morality than to dogma, and who insisted more upon inward principle than outward practices.

His behaviour and his exhortations to me wore the stamp of this peculiar frame of mind. He did not, indeed, say in explicit terms, "Those articles of faith, those forms of worship which affect not the heart and influence not the conduct are of little importance. It is those principles, those actions only, on which depend our own happiness and that of our fellow-creatures which we should consider as indispensable." He did not tell me, "Provided you fulfil those moral duties which the Koran requires as well as the Gospel; provided you conduct yourself as a righteous Moslemin, rather than that you should scandalize the world by running backwards and forwards between the cross and the kaaba, sometimes bowing to the one, and sometimes to the other, remain what you have made yourself, and still hope to enter heaven, but with a different passport and at a different gate." The deference he bore his father prevented a direct speech of this sort; but in our conversations he faintly, and only as an irksome task, urged an ostentatious abjuration, which might materially injure my interests without much benefiting my conduct, and only rid the mosque of a bad Moslemin to throw a worse Christian back upon the church; while, on the contrary, he ceased not to depict with all the powers of eloquence and rhetoric the beauty of moral rectitude, the wisdom of goodness, and the necessity of virtue even to sublunary happiness; and spoke of the charm which dignity of mind and manners throws over life with such warmth and delight, as if he wished me to adopt them from taste rather than from cold conviction; and to consider that I was making a sacrifice to happiness, not in adopting, but in resisting the pleasures which these good qualities conferred. Whether from my disposition really offering some particles of what he fancied he saw in it, or from viewing its shades through the favourable medium of his partiality, he often would say he observed in me a singular and romantic turn of mind, capable of becoming as enthusiastic in the cause of virtue as it had been unrestrained in the career of vice. He believed that the same energy and boldness which, while wasted in fostering my evil passions, had made me seek distinction in all that was profligate and base, when employed to resist their sway might render me pre-eminent in all that was exalted and noble; and he therefore felt for the triumph of enlisting in the cause of moral excellence one so capable of shining among its mightiest champions, all the eagerness of an unbounded devotee to its charms.

It is true, the prodigious change in me from the extreme of ill to the extreme of good, Spiridion rightly considered as attainable only through immense efforts; and he regarded the victory over my thus far ungovernable temper, the triumph over my hitherto exclusively cherished vices, as an achievement no less arduous than it was desirable; but that very circumstance, by rendering the success as glorious to the conqueror as it was beneficial to the conquered, added a new stimulus to my friend's yearnings in my behalf. It made him feel a pride on his own account, as he felt an interest on mine, in the accomplishment of the task he had set himself. For he too was of an ambitious mind, and more desirous of success, as success was more difficult. The zeal which from the first he felt in his undertaking, still grew as he advanced in his labours; as the very obstacles he met with forced him to devote his time, his attention, and his powers, more exclusively to his favourite purpose; as, by keeping his mind more steadfastly fixed upon, more thoroughly absorbed in this single object, he weaned it more entirely from all other pursuits; as, in short, by the pains already bestowed, he felt more committed not to cast them away in a pusillanimous dereliction of his plan, ere he reaped the fruits worthy of his perseverance; and he toiled and toiled, until at last all his other views and occupations yielded to that of my sole amendment; until he devoted to my reformation alone all the faculties of his understanding, and all the energies of his heart; until he no longer seemed placed by Providence on this globe for any other purpose but that of making me a worthy member of society; and until—almost working himself up in his honest enthusiasm, into a belief that he had been appointed by the Almighty as my guardian angel—he held himself responsible to his Creator and to his conscience for my conduct, and bound by the very gifts he possessed to devote his whole existence to the purpose of making mine a blessing. To see me wise, to see me happy, and that through his exertions; nay, to sacrifice, if necessary, his own repose and felicity on this globe to mine, became the only bliss Spiridion aspired to on this earth! Indeed, so fully had he identified his fate with mine, or rather, so entirely had he reduced himself to the rank of a mere instrument of my salvation—not indeed by mere faith, or even devout practices, but by an entire reformation of my conduct—that, had the irrevocable decrees of fate destined one of us only to be excepted among the host of heaven I verily believe he would, with all his ardour for excellence, have submitted to stoop to the bitter fruits of sin, in order that Anastasius might not be the one discarded from the realms of bliss eternal!

CHAPTER XXIV.

WITH a temper such as mine, Spiridion was, perhaps, in spite of all his zeal—and I may add, all his abilities—one of the persons worst calculated in some respects, not only to succeed in the more contracted purpose of his father, but even in his own more extended and more liberal design: not only to obtain of me a public and ostentatious return to Christianity, but even a more private though more sincere relinquishment of the failings reprobated alike by every creed: for up to the moment when my young friend undertook my reformation, what was I in point of mental development?—A being of mere instinct; one over whom the cravings of the senses still exerted unlimited sway; who only yet obeyed the impulse of the moment; who had hitherto never learned to listen to the voice of reason or even to weigh the dictates of prudence; who, matured in body and excelling most others in corporeal vigour, was yet in mind a mere child, and like all children, still acknowledged no influence save that of superior physical powers; could be awed into the performance of what was right and proper by no means but those of superior bodily strength; must still, as it were, have the requisite submission to the rules of order and society rendered a habit by compulsion, ere it could become an effect of deliberate choice; and from the very circumstance of possessing with the imbecility of childhood, more than the ordinary powers of mature manhood, must also find more than the ordinary powers of man to cope with, before I could be subdued and brought to a sense of duty. I might, indeed, like other children, in some degree be allured to good by the imitative bias implanted from the earliest period of our existence in our natures; but like all children, I was only disposed to make those the models of my conduct who had begun by making themselves the masters of my imagination, and to take counsel where I felt a previous deference for the person of the counsellor.

Nor was this all : not only did I feel little inclination to obey or to imitate those less rich in personal endowments than myself, but I even hated the mere society of whoever submitted to the shackles of civilization more meekly than I did myself. Like those rude tenants of the forest themselves not yet lured into subjection by civilized man, I shunned every fellow-creature already entrapped in his snares. I only loved to herd with beings, wild, indocile, and unbridled like myself; and if, gregarious though not sociable, I kept not so entirely aloof from other individuals of my species as only to prowl through the wilds of nature in solitary majesty, and never to stoop to companionship except for the purpose of assuaging some cravings of the sense,—I could at any rate only bear to show myself linked by choice to such a set of companions as, ever like myself prone to deride every symptom of order, and to despise as imbecile tameness every sign of respect for decency, were not less anxiously avoided by the sober and steady part of the community than the untamed lion or the unbroken colt. Call it effrontery, or call it bashfulness—temerity or cowardice—I only felt at ease, only thought myself safe, as it were, from the infection of contented slavery, with men who bade defiance to every precept of morality and to every injunction of the law; and the more an individual showed himself broken into a ready compliance with all the requisites of social institutions, and fearful to outstep the received manners and customs of his neighbours, the more I dreaded and avoided him on that very score as a dangerous person, a confederate in the great plot against my natural rights and liberties, and a rancorous though secret enemy, who only coaxed and caressed, in order to betray me to his associates, and to throw with more certainty the fatal noose round my neck.

Add to this, that, still wholly averse from the most distant thoughts of quitting Islamism, still elate with all the pride of the turban, I shrunk from the idea of appearing guided in any degree by one not like myself of the privileged caste; and would sooner have seemed to take lesson or example from a Turkish beggar than from a Greek archon.

Now, of the qualifications thus required in my ghostly director, who possessed fewer, and on the contrary, of the attributes which disqualified for that office who had more, than my friend Spiridion? Even in point of person he wanted some of the conditions most conducive to success in the task which he had undertaken. His figure was elegantly moulded indeed; but, far from possessing the size and strength requisite to support insolence in their possessor, and to curb it in others, he was rather undersized, and only appeared by my side like the willow by the side of the cedar. Again: his features were in as perfect symmetry as Grecian blood could make them; but his countenance unarmed with that look of boldness and daring which represses the brazen stare of audacity and defiance, habitually only expressed gentleness, nay, even timidity; and if bursts of indignation or of rapture would sometimes change its mildness into something so lofty and commanding as to awe any mind not yet wholly impenetrable, still could the purely intellectual ray which shot from it make little impression where—as in most of my associates—all was mere unmixed matter. His manners, too, were elegant and refined; but the more they breathed that elevation and dignity calculated to charm a well-educated circle, the less they partook of that coarse and vulgar dash necessary to please men of blunted feelings and a vitiated taste. Reserved instead of forward, he never had a chance of making the force of reason silence the force of lungs; and, too proud to be conceited, he was at best only praised for discreet and becoming humility by people who, apt themselves greatly to presume upon nothing, could not believe him entitled to extraordinary distinction, who himself announced so few pretensions to notice.

The sombre livery of Christianity, too, so far from offering me any temptation to abjure my more splendidly attired Mohammedan faith, rendered my friend a dark spot—almost a positive blemish—in the brilliant circle in which I moved; so that while I, who knew his intrinsic worth, only the more feared his watchful eye, and felt restrained by his presence, others, emboldened by his modest exterior, made him the object of liberties painful to us both. Hence, though I could not but venerate Spiridion's character, I felt somewhat averse to his company; and so far from meeting his advances, I discouraged his assiduity. Sometimes, when he pressed me to make him my associate and my confidant, I used only to answer jestingly, and say, "How can I possibly live with you, or introduce you to those I live with, who have not one idea in common with them; whose very language seems a different idiom, as unintelligible to them as theirs is to you—who stare at every unguarded expression, shrink from every spirited proposal, and groan at every bolder frolic: who stay at the door where others walk in, remain sober while others revel in festivity, keep watch where others slumber, and have the folly to be wise where others have the wisdom to court folly?" At other times I spoke more seriously, and warned the youth in sober earnest against wasting his valuable gifts in the fruitless attempt to reform one by long habit too deeply sunk in sin to leave a chance of amendment. "How can you, Spiridion," would I ask, "with your excellent understanding, expect any good from a wretch so thoroughly broken into every species of evil, so suppld by long practice into every form of vice, so loose in all his mental hinges, so dislocated in all his moral joints, that all his inclinations turn with equal facility towards wrong as towards right? The very transcendancy of your merit—my all good, all perfect friend!—leaves you a far less chance of inoculating me with the smallest particle of righteous feeling, than might have befallen a person of inferior worth, less proudly soaring above my own level, and whom I could have met half way. You and I are too far asunder in the scale of beings ever to come in contact together, either in this world or the next." And hereupon, in order to prove my assertion by illustrations taken from facts, and to enjoy Spiridion's surprise and horror, I would commence the braggadocio of vice, and give my friend such details of my iniquity as made him raise meekly to heaven his dark expressive eyes; until, unable any longer to bear the revolting tale, he would start up, run to me, put his hand on my lips, and supplicate me to spare at least him, if not myself.

It was not long, however, before even Spiridion felt that nothing was so inimical to the success of his scheme as his too forbidding fastidiousness. He therefore tried to shake off his prudery, at least in appearance, to conquer his too evident disgust at the tone and manner of my habitual associates, and to bring himself down more nearly to their level. In short, he gave up his refined pursuits and his regular habits, for the honour of holding in my esteem the same rank with a set of blustering profligates. Upon the sublime principle of seducing me to virtue, he became the patient witness of all my vices. He followed me to those temples where Aphrodite wears no veil, in order to preach to me decency; and more than once in the orgies he assisted at, he narrowly escaped being the reeling victim to his own fervour for opening my eyes to the loathsomeness of intoxication.

Even this effected not the wished-for purpose. Liberalism, as well as refinement, requires its apprenticeship. It is not the attainment of a single day, and sits as awkwardly on the wearer as fastidiousness, where it flows not from the heart. In my train, Spiridion never could catch the spirit of the place or the tone of the company. His best attempts at extravagance only looked like demureness run mad; and if his endeavours to do as others did, and to set my gayer friends at their ease, had any effect at all, it was only that of making them, while he was by, look as stiff and constrained as himself. The moment his name was announced, every countenance fell, and every lip was sealed up. Adieu from that moment to all that lightness of heart, all that flow of spirits, without which vice itself, only pursued with the dullness of a task, loses its seductive gloss, and for want of a brilliant exterior to dazzle the eye, shows all its inward foulness. Instead of rendering my associates pleased with him, Spiridion only contrived to put them out of conceit with themselves. The genuine sons of mirth and revelry dreaded the intrusion of this false brother. Abashed at the mere sight of one to whose manners they were strangers, and to whose behaviour they had no clew, they insensibly in his company—without themselves knowing why—lost all their assurance, and felt their air of boldness and defiance degenerate into a subdued and humble manner. Not but that they strove to resist the novel influence. Fearful lest in his presence they should appear to have lost their wonted tone, they even talked louder than usual, were wittier, made more jests, ironically wished me joy of my new friend, and complained of his repartee, as too much for their dullness: but aside and by stealth, they frowned at me for having brought an extinguisher among their jovial troop; and I myself wished, from the bottom of my heart, that Spiridion had remained a complete saint, rather than have become half a sinner; for no purpose but to spoil all the sport of genuine honest rakes!

But be a man ever so sturdy in his resistance to the voice of reason, still, if fated day after day to witness in another the most unabating solicitude for his reformation, the most untiring efforts to seduce him to virtue, and these endeavours proceeding, not from interested motives, nor even from a wish to display superiority, but solely from so ardent a desire to procure a beloved object's lasting welfare, that the monitor would even with pleasure sacrifice his own happiness to that of his friend; if, above all, he beholds this anxiety for his advantage show itself, not in intrusive advice, irksome reproof, and acrimonious censure, but only in the keenest watchfulness, the gentlest persuasion, the most exulting looks at each instance of success, and the most evident dejection at every failure in the benevolent attempt; he must have in his composition materials still harder and more compact than mine, to remain wholly unpenetrated by so deep a devotion and so flattering a testimonial, lurking under reproof itself; never to catch himself wishing it cost him less to repay with some improvement such constant pains for his sake, and not to feel for such vast sacrifices, however ineffectual, at least a return of something more than cold gratitude.

It is true, no person, wont to combine cause and effect, could expect that in a vortex of unceasing dissipation, hurried on without intermission to excesses of every description, my heart, volatile by nature, and by constant friction somewhat blunted in its feelings, should return with equal intensity Spiridion's affection. My regard necessarily must have intermittences, display fits and starts, and be interrupted by intervals of forgetfulness, nay of coolness. In the pursuit of pleasure I would shun the sight of the young Greek, in the intoxication of enjoyment I would neglect his society, in the phrensy of passion I would hide myself from his view as from that of an unwelcome monitor; but still did his daily converse here and there drop a seed of tenderness and compunction in my bosom, often unheeded at first, and which only expanded after he had left me, and after the constraint of his presence had ceased to obstruct a more general survey of his noble conduct—like the corn which can only begin to germinate when screened from the rays of that sun the primitive source of its life and its growth. In the midst of the raillery at Spiridion's expense with which I tried to keep up my unconcern, I conceived for him a real and deep-rooted attachment; and though we rarely associated together in my hours of joy, the moment I felt the least grief or disappointment—the instant the faithlessness of a mistress, the treachery of a companion, or the superciliousness of a grandee cast the least cloud over my happiness—I would leave all my ephemeral friends, and run to pour my feelings and my sorrows into the bosom of their sole, real, and permanent depository. From his lips alone I expected the balm of consolation; and though long and distant were my flights, still would I ever ultimately return to Spiridion's arms, as the stork, from the furthestmost regions of the globe, returns to her unchanging wonted nest.

My growing regard for Spiridion, and my admiration of his worth, awoke in my breast the first cry of conscience and the first risings of shame. In the presence of my friend I would sometimes repress the rashness of my temper, and regret the violence of my passions. I blushed for the vices in which I had formerly exulted. For the first time in my life I took pains to excuse my errors, and laid down plans for rooting out my ill propensities. I went so far as actually to meditate a general reform; nor did I at any time put off the execution to a very distant period. If I carried not immediately my good intentions into effect; if inveterate habit frequently made me relapse into my evil doings, still did I no longer find in the commission that zest, that unalloyed pleasure, which they used to afford me. I felt the bitterness of remorse follow the sweets of indulgence. So great was the revolution in my sentiments, that it often made me contemplate with envy the calm dignity of Spiridion's life and occupations, which before I treated with contempt. Looking over him, when he would hurry the completion of some noble work, or lay by the pursuit of some interesting study, in compliance with my eagerness for some low or trivial pastime, I often could not help repining at the difference of our disposition. "Ah," said I, "Spiridion! why was it not my fate to be brought up like you!—In me, too, nature had implanted many a rich and varied germ. Cultivation might have made them expand into all that was useful and beautiful. Fragrant blossoms might have been grafted on my stock full of vigour and sap; luxurious fruits might have adorned my branches: but, alas! I was born in a desert, I grew up remote from the sunshine of civilization, and I put forth only wild and fruitless boughs, distorted by ceaseless storms, and casting wide around them a drear and deadly shade !”

Nor was this all ! Whenever Spiridion parted from me to go into the presence of his God, to prostrate himself before his Maker, and to listen with devout attention to the loud hymns sung in praise of his Saviour ; whenever, in conjunction with all his assembled countrymen, he addressed through the mediation of holy ministers his supplications to Heaven in the language and with the forms left him by his forefathers, and which once had been mine ; whenever, in his doubts and perplexities, he derived comfort from performing the awful signs of his creed, and attending the sacred rites of his ancient religion ; I panted to follow him to the place of my old worship, to kneel down by his side before the holy doors* of the sanctuary, and to join in his ardent and heartfelt devotions at the altar of Christ ! I repined at the solace he was receiving, and of which I had deprived myself ; regretted that change which only permitted me an open, a public, and a solemn approach to my Creator and my Judge in a strange house, under a spurious garb, and in a language not my own ; loathed the Moslemin rites which, converting every act of devotion I panted to perform into a solemn mummery, bereft my appeal of its earnestness, my prayers of their unction, and my worship of its sanctity ; and secretly vowed—should I not be able immediately to re-enter the pale of the church I had abandoned—at least some day before my death to compel the holy gates to open to my supplications, and again to admit within the dread precincts now closed against the renegade, my sighs of shame, of contrition, and of penitence !

Thus did the gentle timidity of Spiridion end by making a deep impression on my obdurate heart, and resemble the frequent falling drop, which by slow degrees hollows out the hardest stone. That empire over my will, which the young Greek never would have obtained had he attempted to assume the least authority, he, by an almost unreserved submission to my own caprice, now for many an hour held undisputed.

It is, however, true, that the utmost actual amendment in my ways still remained prodigiously short of the quantity requisite to form a particularly valuable member of society. The effect of Spiridion's exhortations rarely went beyond good resolutions. Seldom did they ripen into actual realities ; at least of such a nature as to claim peculiar praise. The occasions on which I expressed the strongest determination to become a new being were often those on which I relapsed into some old sin with more impetuosity than ever. The very contrition, however, which followed the misdeed was already, in one who before gloried in evil, a great step towards good ; and the power in Spiridion to produce that feeling, the sign of a vast hold obtained over my wayward soul.

How great, however, was the toil, how constant the watching of my friend, to retain that feeble sway over my furious passions which he had with such labour acquired. What unceasing terror he felt lest my perverse instinct should again recover its noxious preponderance over my still weak and giddy reason. How he trembled for fear of seeing me like a young tiger half-tamed, at the faintest scent of blood or glimpse of the forest, resume all my sanguinary yearnings and all my roving inclinations, break my fetters, recover my ferocity, and forfeit all the fruits of my tedious education.

And but too often still were all his sinister forebodings on the point of being realized ; but too often still would I sigh at the remembrance of those days when no monitor from within checked the freedom of my will and actions ; when, if the voice of pleasure called, or the spur of instinct urged, no second thought, no extraneous consideration, held me back ; when, above all, no subsequent reflection, no dread of reproof, imbittered the image of the joys I had snatched from the fleeting wing of time, and had made my own beyond recalling. Often still would I say to myself—"Because a little Greek, who is neither my relation nor my master, happens to owe to me his life, is he entitled to rob me of my liberty ; or because his mind is by nature's ordination so well regulated as without effort or sacrifice to pursue a steady course, must my soul, which that same nature has been pleased to render fiery, impetuous, turbulent, and without rule or measure in its motions, be, through dint of the utmost violence, forced into the same even pace ?" Often, from feelings of contrition for my offences, I relapsed into feelings of indignation at the shackles imposed upon my will. I railed at Spiridion for thwarting my inclinations, and at myself for submitting to his yoke. The influence he had gained over my mind only appeared to me a usurpation, and the restraint he put upon my passions a tyranny. The fear I felt of his reproaches, and the care I took to avoid his displeasure, no longer seemed to me aught but a wanton surrender of my rightful independence, a disgraceful prostration of my freedom, which made me weep with anguish, or rather with rage. "Is it I—is it Anastasius," I exclaimed, "who suffers the silly and minute formalities of society, like the small but numerous threads and meshes of a net, to confine every limb, and to impede every motion? Is it I who have lost all free agency, and, like a puppet, can only obey the pleasures of another?" And at these mortifying thoughts shame burned in my cheek, and anger sat quivering on my lips.

I then resolved to tear asunder my slight yet heavy trammels, to assert my freedom, and afresh roam at liberty; but the passions long restrained only broke loose with more resistless fury. The act intended to manifest my recovered liberty was always some extravagance far exceeding the most outrageous of my former follies.

My friend on these occasions seemed lost in despair. Breathless, except when now and then a deep sigh forced its way from the inmost of his soul—like the slow bubble which rises from the very bottom of the seemingly motionless pool—he hung his head in gloomy silence; while, proud of my feat, and like the steed turned loose in the meadow, I snorted, shook my mane, and looked round with fierce and taunting eye; until, after a certain time, the effervescence of my blood again subsiding, I returned to a sense of my folly, felt contrition for my excesses, and blushed at my bravado. Then again I execrated my ungovernable temper, beat in anguish my throbbing breast, convulsively grasped my friend's retiring hand, and, by confessing how little I deserved it, in the end obtained his forgiveness. Spiridion, who the moment before had renounced all hopes of my reform, now again began with fresh ardour to toil at his chimera.

The father's less pertinacious dream meanwhile had subsided. Spiridion still might expect some day to bring me to the path of virtue, Mavrocordato clearly saw that he was not the person destined to lead me back into that of the Greek church. He almost began to think it possible that, instead of his son's reclaiming me to Christianity, I might end by seducing his son to Mohammedanism. At any rate, he now deemed the free admittance of a personage of my description into the interior of his family, as equally injurious to the moral character of that son and to the commercial credit of his house. He first endeavoured to intimate this new opinion to me by a studied coolness and reserve, totally different from his former warmth of manner. Unluckily, as I never had courted his favour, I heeded not the change, nor considered the caprice of the sire as a reason for withdrawing my countenance from the unoffending son. Mavrocordato, therefore, was at last obliged to be more explicit.

I had one evening made myself rather conspicuous at Kandilly. The next morning, as I was sitting with Spiridion, in walked his father, who had staid from his office on purpose. He inquired very civilly after my health, hoped I had not caught cold, and then apprized me in terms polite but peremptory, that his occupations no longer permitted him to manage my property, nor his views to cultivate my society; returned me the remains of my deposite, which my frequent drafts had greatly reduced, presented me with an exquisitely penned abstract of my account, which he begged me to cast up at my leisure; recommended me to look out for a lodging more convenient for my purposes, and to drop an intimacy with his son of use to neither; and, taking his leave, wished me all manner of happiness.

However politely Mavrocordato's compliment might be turned as to the form, I could not help thinking it very rude as to the matter. His behaviour seemed to me both unfair and unhandsome. In fact, was I the one that had made the first advances to this purse-proud merchant? or had he, on the contrary, first sought of me a renewal of intimacy?—He might have left me alone if he had chosen. I asked not of him any attention; I expected not any civility; I should have been perfectly contented if the accidental meeting had ended, as it had begun, in the market-place. But to invite me to his house, to press upon me his hospitalities, to admit of no denial to his solicitations; and all this only in order that he might end the farce by turning me out of doors which I hardly ever vouchsafed to enter—and that without the least preparation or warning!—It was what I could not brook, and what I promised myself some day to resent. Meantime,

I determined not to trespass another instant on the forbearance of one so anxious to recall his bounty, and spite of all Spiridion's entreaties that I should at least stay the night, and all his endeavours to convince me that his father could not mean things as I understood them, I walked out. Nor did I, until launched into the very middle of the street, stop to consider how I was to dispose of my person and my casket. Then indeed I felt a little at a loss, and could have liked to walk in again. But this my pride forbade.

I had not ruminated half a minute before I wondered how I could have felt any embarrassment at all. Within a stone's throw of Mavrocordato lived the fittest person to succeed him as depositary of my fortune: namely, his most rancorous enemy—an Armenian, and a cashier, who hated him with all the cordiality of one whose commercial schemes had been less successful than his own. There was no species of mischief which the envious Aïdin had not attempted to do his more fortunate or more skilful neighbour. First, he had endeavoured to ruin him by representing his wealth as a mere fabrication. Unable to succeed this way he took the contrary method, and laid snares no longer against his credit, but against his life, by accusing him of having doubled his fortune through means of the treasure of a beheaded vizier, found concealed in his garden. But he was fated to be foiled alike in the most opposite attempts. For when, in order to circumstantiate his evidence, he showed the officers of the fisc the place in the Greek's garden where from his window he had with his own eyes seen him dig out the ponderous chests filled with gold and jewels, something more ponderous was found still unremoved; namely, such an immense and continuous stratum of solid rock, as, without being great mineralogists, the very satellites of the hazné judged to have lain there undisturbed since the flood.

Now, the personage who had been at all these pains to stamp himself a rogue, I sagaciously selected for the depositary of my money. As to my person, I felt little at a loss how to dispose of it.

CHAPTER XXV.

My worldly affairs thus prudently arranged, I attended to my spiritual concerns; and to compensate for not eating cavier during the Greek Lent, properly fasted during the Turkish Ramadan. Every one knows how trying that month is to the temper of the good Mohammedan. As long as the sun lingers above the horizon, he dares not refresh himself with the least morsel of food, the least drop of liquor, or even the least whiff of tobacco. His whole occupation consists in counting his beads, and in contemplating the slow-moving hand of his timepiece, until the moment when the luminary of the world is pleased to release him from his abstinence, by withdrawing its irksome orb from his sight. Sufficiently disagreeable as it might appear for every purpose of salvation when it falls in winter, the month of the Ramadan seems absolutely invented for the destruction of the Moslemin species, when the procession of the lunar months brings it round to the longest and hottest days of summer. It is then that the Christian, rising from a plenteous meal, if he has common prudence, avoids all intercourse whatever with the fasting Turk, whose devout stomach, void of all but sourness and bile, grumbles loudly over each chance-medley of the sort as over malice prepense, rises in anger at the supposed insult, and vents its acrimony in bitter invectives.

Sometimes a demure Moslemin may be seen looking anxiously round on all sides, to ascertain that he is not watched. The moment he thinks himself unobserved, he turns the corner of some of the Christian streets of Pera or Galata, and ascends the infidel hill.* Led on, as it were, by mere listlessness from one turn to another, the gentleman still advances, until perverse chance brings him just opposite a confectioner's or a pastry-cook's shop. From sheer absence of mind he indeed steps in, but he buys nothing. Allah forbid! He only from pure curiosity examines the various eatables laid out on the counter. He handles, he weighs them, he asks their names, their price, and their ingredients. What is this? what do you call that? Where does that other come from? Thus discoursing to while away time, he by little and little reaches the inner extremity of the shop; and finding himself at the entrance of the recess, in which by mere accident happens to have been set out, as if in readiness for some expected visiter, a choice collation of all that can recruit an exhausted stomach—he enters it from mere thoughtlessness, and without the least intention. Without the least intention also the pastry-cook, the moment he sees<sup>d</sup> his friend slunk into the dainty closet, turns upon him the key of the door, and slips it into his pocket. Perhaps he even goes out on a message, and half an hour or so elapses ere he remembers his unaccountable act of forgetfulness. He however at last recollects his prisoner, who all the while would have made a furious outcry, but has abstained lest he should unjustly be suspected of having gone in for the purpose of tasting the forbidden fruit. The Greek unlocks the door with every expression of apology and regret; the Turk walks out in high dudgeon, severely rebukes the vender of cakes, and returns home weaker with inanition than ever. But when the pastry-cook looks into his recess to put things in order, he finds, by a wonderful piece of magic, the pies condensed into piastres, and the sugar-plums transformed into sequins.

I suppose my new banker suspected me of sometimes dealing in this unlawful sorcery, and wished to destroy the transmutations in their very source. He disappeared with my casket. On the twentieth day of the Ramadan I found myself with a tremendous appetite, five sequins in my pocket, and not a farthing elsewhere.

Ever since my final exit from Mavrocordato's house, Spiridion had kept completely aloof from me, and I had not once seen my till then inseparable friend. That he was a dutiful son I knew; that he would not only fly in the face of his father's commands I had expected; but I was not prepared to find that where his friend was concerned he would conform to his parent's orders with such scrupulous punctuality. It mortified me; and as prompt as ever to value things only when forbidden, I now began to long for the youth's company; "After all, how preferable," thought I, "was his society to any other. What information he possessed—what knowledge he imparted!—How full of resource was his mind, and of variety his conversation!—How different from the empty rattle of men whose ideas never moved out of a single narrow circle, and whose efforts at jocoseness absolutely sickened with repetition. How many more acute observations on life at large he used to make, who only seemed to view its storms and whirlwinds from a narrow estuary deep inland, than those who sailed down its fullest tide. The very reflection of his own excellence cast a lustre upon those who associated with him. They felt greater self-esteem from being in his company ;”—and I could not forgive myself for so wantonly forfeiting what was so valuable in itself, and so willingly bestowed !

Yet, if even prior to the loss of all I possessed I had felt too proud to seek one who shunned me, it may well be supposed that since that event I should more than ever spurn all attempts at renewing the intercourse. However great my distress might be, I would rather have thrown myself upon the generosity of an absolute stranger, than upon the kindness of a friend who forgot me. Two days, however, had scarce elapsed since the retreat of the Armenian, when, as I lay despondingly on my couch, who should I see standing beside me, like a cheering vision, but my still true Spiridion ! The disappearance of the banker had soon been published, and amply commented upon in the commercial world. My friend knew my little property to be in his hands. He had immediately inquired into my circumstances ; and, apprized of my ruin, had come to my relief.

His pecuniary offers he found me unwilling to accept. “Your friendship, Spiridion,” cried I, “is dearer to me than ever ; but away with your purse ! It offends my eyes. I love you too well to become your debtor.”

“Selim,” replied the son of Mavrocordato, “if what affection bestows demands a return of gratitude, believe me, it is too late to escape the irksome burthen. You are already too deeply in my debt for all the anxiety you have cost me. In the scale in which your reformation has outweighed all consideration of my own repose, in which your welfare has preponderated over all my interests and schemes in life, a handful of paltry gold is but a speck of dust devoid of weight !”

I felt the truth of this speech, bade my foolish pride be silent, and accepted the money. “This gift,” exclaimed I, clasping the purse with both hands, and placing it next my heart, "will enable me to prove that your friendship has not been thrown away; that the seeds you toiled to sow, though slow to rise, have sprung up at last: their fruits will soon appear. Henceforth, Spiridion, I tear from my bosom every root of evil; henceforth I renounce all the pleasures of vice; henceforth I become a new man—thy boast, thy credit, and thy glory!"

These words, the first of the sort my friend had ever heard me utter, sounded in his ears like music from heaven. Tears of emotion started from his eyes—he embraced me with convulsive rapture. What more could he wish for? His long-sought triumph was complete; and like men on the morrow of a victory which terminates a toilsome war, we had only to sit down and discuss at leisure the new plan of life suitable to my new resolutions. Upon this we enlarged as upon a delightful dream soon to be realized, until, fearing to stay longer, Spiridion at last rose to tear himself away from me.

Evening was stealing on, and darkness beginning to let loose all the hounds of hell that shunned the light of day. It was scarce safe for Spiridion to return home without some escort. "Stay, Spirro," said I; "this once let me be permitted to accompany you. Even your father, just now, I am sure, would wish to know me by your side." Spiridion consented.

Our way lay by a coffee-house, the favourite resort of those against whom other doors were shut. On the threshold stood lounging a boy—the son of a capidjee* of the Porte—with whom I had already before once or twice had a tiff. Achmet was his name—insolence his profession. His behaviour had made him the pest of the whole neighbourhood. As soon as he spied us, "What," cried he, "the old inseparables again risen from the dead! See how the hound lugs the hog by the ears!" At these insulting words I felt the blood rush in my face; rage convulsed my whole body: I grasped my handjar; but at the same instant the remembrance of my recent promise to my friend flashed across my mind; and, smothering my indignation, I silently hurried on.

Spiridion, who had turned pale with anticipation of the consequences of so grievous an insult, observed the struggle in my bosom: "Anastasius," said he, "I see all, and I thank you. But suffer me to pursue my way alone. In the land where my ancestors held the sceptre I am become thy reproach."

"What, Spiridion," replied I; "when you come to save me, I leave you in danger! I leave you exposed to the insult of the bigot, and the blows of the ruffian? Never!" And spite of my friend's entreaties, I continued by his side until his own door opened to afford him safety. I then pressed his hand, bade him farewell, and went back.

The lateness of the hour quickened my pace. In the most lonely part of the road I overtook Achmet, likewise on his way home, and passed by the swaggering coxcomb.

His sagacity had construed into fear my preceding endurance. Accordingly, his insolence only increased. "Coward," exclaimed he, "you run too fast for me to take the pains of pursuing you. But I depute this messenger to give you my errand;" and on my looking round to see what he meant, I felt a huge stone graze my ear. But for the motion of turning round my head, it must have broken my jaw.

Human patience could endure no longer. I faced the ruffian. Each lifted his hand, but my dagger went first to the heart. My antagonist fell without a groan. I paused a while, but he had ceased to breathe! Raising the lifeless body, I threw it over a wall into an adjoining cemetery, and walked off.

No mortal had beheld the conflict; but the prior provocation had had all Kandilly for a witness. What the darkness of the night a while concealed the dawn of the next day could not fail to bring to light; and to no one but me would the deed be imputed. Achmet, indeed, was abhorred, but his parents were respected. Having, therefore, much to apprehend from the law, and little means to purchase justice, I determined not to try which would carry the day.

Still, however, before I abandoned for ever the abode and the vicinity of my friend, I determined to see him once more. By another way I ran back to his house. For the first time since his door had been shut against me, I knocked. He recognised my hand. It was the rap I used to give when, coming in late from my evening rambles, I feared to disturb his father. He himself opened to me.

"Spiridion," said I, "but an hour ago I pledged all I could pledge to make you witness in me an entire reform. Alas, it is no longer time! I only return so soon to bid you adieu for ever. Forget me; forget a wretch whom his ill fate pursues; and thank Heaven you are thus rid of one on whom misfortune has set its mark!"

I then told him what had happened; mentioned where I meant to go; and imploring the Almighty to shower on my tender, my last, my only friend his choicest blessings, once more pressed to my arms the companion of my childhood, and broke away.

But little time was requisite to deliver over the few articles I left behind me to the care of my hostess, to saddle my horse, and to ride to Iskindar.* There I crossed the channel, entered Constantinople just at the dawn of day, and traversing its long and still empty streets from end to end, went out again at the gate of Adrianople, across field and common, gained the western road, and about the middle of the day reached the town of Rodosto.

In this out of the way place, I thought myself safe, at least for a few hours; and feeling much fatigued, went to a kind of coffee-house, asked for a private room, and lay down on the floor to take a little rest. I had scarce begun to doze when I was suddenly roused by a loud knocking; and by a sort of rumour, immediately ensuing, of which I seemed the object.

I listened, though without getting up, and for some time could only confusedly make out inquiries on one side and answers on the other. At last one sentence distinctly struck my ear, uttered by some one of the party within. "He is up-stairs, and alone." It sufficed for my information. Nothing could be more evident than that my exploit had been discovered, and my footsteps traced. The only thing now left for me to do was, to sell my devoted life as dear as possible. Already was the posse hurrying up stairs, and approaching my door. I drew my yatagan, and cried out with all my might, "Whoever enters dies!" But such was the noise outside, that my threat remained unheard. At least it was not heeded. The door burst open; in rushed my pursuer, and down fell my sword—upon my own Spiridion!

The sight of my friend had not been able entirely to stop my uplifted arm; but it broke the force of the blow.

The weapon fell innocuous ; and Spiridion, at first quite breathless, and unable to utter a syllable, by degrees recovered his breath, sat down, and spoke as follows :

“ You are surprised, Anastasius, to see me again ; but listen. When last night, after your departure, I lay down to sleep, I thought I had entirely conquered my first impulse to follow you. I thought that among the opposite duties contending in my breast, those which I owed my father had a superior claim ; and thought so the more as my wishes leaned the other way. In vain, however, I closed my eyes !—my mind found no rest, and a feeling of inexpressible anguish invaded my body. While I lay, oppressed by an insufferable weight, but unable to stir and throw it off, my door gently opened, and without the least noise a form glided in which approached my bedside. It was that of my mother—of her whom I loved, and lost the first !

“ ‘ My son,’ it said, looking sternly in my face, ‘ vows of gratitude are recorded by angels, and only demons blot them out. He who at this moment, breaking the solemn silence of the night, with his horse’s heavy hoof shakes the ground over my head, saved thy life at the risk of his own, in days that seem forgotten. For having saved it a second time, a second time his own is threatened. In return for these deeds of love, my son, thy very father once made thee promise to regard him as a brother, and for ever to stand by him, both in good and adverse fortune—and thou wouldst now leave thy brother to wander through the world a lonely, unprotected, friendless outcast !’

“ Here the dread shade ceased to speak. But much as I tried to answer, I had not the power. My jaw was of stone, and my tongue cleaved to my mouth. The vision disappeared. A loud clap like thunder shook to dust my imaginary fetters. I started up and obeyed !”

Spiridion said no more. I looked at him in astonishment. “ Is it you,” I cried, “ my friend !—till now so inaccessible to every form of superstition—who mistake the dream of an agitated mind, or the nightmare of a suffering frame, for the directing voice of Heaven ? Ah ! ere you give way to such delusions, reflect but one moment on what may be the consequence. Consider who you are—what destinies await you. Think that on you depends the happiness of an affectionate parent, and the preservation of a noble family ; that for you are reserved the respect of dependants, the wealth of relations, and the honours of the world: think that I, on the contrary, am a wretch, ruined in fortune and in fame, long ago rejected by his friends and family, now renounced by his fellow-citizens, and proscribed by the laws of his country; then say to yourself that between us no further society can subsist—no common interests can be maintained; that, far from offering to follow my fate, it is your business to fly from my society as from a pestilence, and to avoid the contagion of my breath, which must at last involve all that remain within its reach. I myself could not allow you to barter your advantages against my wretchedness; could not permit the sufferings of my friend to increase the sins already on my head! I myself must implore you to remember your now grieving father, and to forget for ever the lost, the miserable Anastasius."

"Cruel friend!" replied Spiridion, "talk not to me of the world! Was I ever elate with its blandishments, or solicitous for its distinctions? My father, indeed—but who more earnestly than he ever urged my prior duty to my God? Who oftener dwelt upon the paramount sacredness of the engagements contracted with Heaven? Let then the vision I beheld have been real, or have arisen only within the compass of my heated brain; still has it spoken what I must accomplish; still dare I not desert my brother. Since then Heaven wills you to go, I must not stay behind. Under Hassan's banners my friend purposes afresh in Egypt to pursue the path of fame. Well!—with him I may go; with him I too may run the race of glory! We shall fight side by side. Perhaps I may some day save your life, as you once saved mine. Perhaps, vouchsafed the bliss to shed my blood for my friend, I may die on his bosom the death of the brave! Or, if Providence should guard us both, should permit both to live—triumphant with thee, I shall with thee return; and with thine lay my laurels at my exulting father's feet! Does not Mavrocordato himself—prizing his son's elevation beyond that son's existence—destine me to those high offices whose approach is over daggers, and whose end is the bowstring? Thus already inured to danger ere I enter my career, already armed with martial renown ere I encounter my rivals, I shall with greater confidence commence the struggle, and with greater vigour contend for the prize sought by a father's ambition under a son's borrowed name!"

"No, Spiridion," answered I, "it shall not be! In accompanying me, thou goest not to renown; thou goest only to disgrace, perhaps to perdition. Thou assumest the appearance of my accomplice. Thou coverest with dishonour a thus far spotless name. Thanks to my conduct, I am alone in the world; I belong to no one else; I am a twig torn from its stem, that strikes no root, and bears no blossom. My existence goes for nothing in the sum of earthly things! My lonely fate involves no other destiny! The weed of my sterile existence any one may pluck up, may tear, may cast upon a dunghill—and no loss be felt, no regret expressed, no cognizance taken of the deed, no tear, save by thee, shed over my remains, nor any flower, save by thee, planted on my lonely grave! Of what importance is it where I may wander, or what may become of me? But thou, to plunge headlong from the summit of earthly blessings into the abyss in which already I lie prostrate; thou, to cover thy fair name with the foulness of mine—No, no, it cannot, it shall not be!"

Here the young Greek's tone and manner at once entirely changed. "Anastasius," cried he, with a rage so concentrated it almost looked like calmness: "you may spurn me from your side, you may proceed without me. But, mark the consequence. I return to Constantinople, I go before the judge, and in the face of the whole public I proclaim myself what I am—the murderer of Achmet!"

It now was evident that emotion and fatigue, acting on a susceptible frame, and a mind always exalted, had produced in Spiridion that degree of excitement which rendered further opposition dangerous. I thought it best for the present to give way; bowed, and submitted.

On my first arrival at Rodosto, I had desired my horse might be sold for me, and a boat hired to continue my journey. In their excessive zeal for my service the good people of the house had parted with my steed for half his value, and had taken a boat at double the usual fare; but it was not a time to mind minute miscalculations. The boatmen were waiting; I stepped in, and Spiridion followed. Before the sun had set, the wind, in conjunction with the current, carried us out of the Bog-haz into the open sea.

Just as we launched into the wide basin of the Archipelago, the sun's brilliant disk was majestically dropping behind the distant crags of Athos, whose gigantic and insulated mass, alone dimly beheld soaring above the silver wave, looked like the huge spirit of the deep emerged from its dark caverns to survey his domain. With the last departing rays of the orb of day also died away the breeze, leaving the liquid plain as smooth as a mirror.

The monotonous sound of the oar, falling upon the waters in slow and steady cadence, now remained the only sound which broke the universal silence, and insensibly its solemn and regular return disposed me to ruminate on my portion of life already wound off.

"How whimsical a thing," thought I, "is a man's destiny! How variously seem contrasted its most proximate vicissitudes, and yet how intimately are linked its furthest incidents: by how many anterior minute and hidden agencies is often irresistibly produced the last and sole ostensible cause of the weightiest events! How entirely is the will that seems spontaneously to urge us on, an unavoidable offspring of circumstances wholly independent of that will, since prior to the very existence of the being whom it sways! A fair form arises in Damascus; and this form, flitting through the distant streets, and just caught by my eye as it vanishes away—this form, never before or since beheld—makes me throw down a Frank on the steps of the mosque, crop a friar's beard in a barber's shop, seek refuge from a Syrian pasha's wrath in Constantinople's vortex, incur, in protecting an old friend, the insolence of a stranger, rid the world of a ruffian for threatening my own life, and again abandon Stamboul to fly—God only yet knows to what remote part of this ill-conditioned globe!

"How fearfully, above all, blood begets blood! Had I not many years before slain a Greek under the walls of the capital, I should not have spilt mamluke blood under the battlements of Cairo; nor, by a recoil as distant as the first impulse, again have shed Turkish blood in Constantinople's suburbs.

"But stay; in this filiation of slaughter was I entirely passive? Had my own temper no share in the sanguinary parentage? Did not the untowardness of my own disposition give fertility to otherwise barren circumstances? If at one time I durst have owned a friend, at another could have pardoned an enemy, at a third have held in the contempt he deserved a silly coxcomb,—would not the treble generation of murders have been stifled in the birth, the causes that brought them forth remained childless, and the black offspring never darkened the earth with its shade?

“True, indeed! But that if, that indispensable condition of the more favourable alternative—what prevented its growing into a reality? What mixed up with my temper those fiery, those combustible ingredients, always ready to explode, to drive away every suggestion of reason, and to raise my hand ere my mind could check the blow? was it myself?—certainly not!

“For if, on my outset in life the option had been offered me, how gladly would I have received, instead of a bias to evil and its bitter fruits, an inclination to good and its beneficial consequences! It was the examples I beheld, the lessons I was taught, nay, the very elements which I inherited from my parents, that fraught me with my preponderating proneness to evil. It was that part of my being for which I have as little reason to blame my own will, as others have a right to thank their own volition, who, from a happier organization, derive the superior advantage of judgment, temperance, and coolness: for while the inclination of the brute, like a pillar placed upon the solid earth, can only be moved by a force most intense and most palpable, the propensities of man, resembling the pendulum poised in air, often yield irresistibly to an influence seemingly the most gentle—to the slightest breath of wind! and if man fancies himself the free agent he is not; if man regards many of his actions as wholly spontaneous, which are the last inevitable effects of a long series of prior hidden causes; if man overlooks the vast machinery founded on the first progress of time, and extending to the farthest limits of space, by which, independent of his will, all we behold, unto that very will, is produced; if man consents to a gratuitous responsibility from which he exempts the brute, and might exempt himself, it is precisely because his intellectual organization, from being so much finer than that even of the highest brute, is often compelled to volition and its consequences by agencies so much more complex, and minute, and distant, and yet connected, that, from that very circumstance, it is often impossible to trace them to any particular anterior source, and to recognise them in any particular later effect;—or, in other words, man only thinks himself more peculiarly gifted with liberty than other animals, because he is the more equal, and general, and unresisting slave to a greater number of more subtle and uncontrollable surrounding tyrants, physical and moral. Unpossessed of the smallest component particle of body or of intellect, of will or of knowledge, of sensation or of thought, which—if its Maker be really the sole creator, mover, and upholder of all things created—is not an emanation, a part of that very Maker; incapable of conceiving the most transient desire, and performing the most trifling action, which—if there be a single first cause of all secondary causes or effects whatsoever—does not proceed from the express will of that single first cause; unable to name any species of temptation whatsoever, which—if all things originate in one single source—flows not in reality from that single first source, as much as the strength to resist or the weakness that yields; vainglorious man, however curiously the impressions he receives from external objects may, in that strange piece of mechanism his brain, successively assume the various forms of sensation, thought, and will, is not the less, from his first to his last breath, as entirely a mere passive instrument in the hands of Providence as the insentient plant, or the unorganized mineral; and, so far from deserving to have his bickerings with his brother mites on this grain of sand magnified into an insurrection of giants against heaven, seems to me as fully entitled to credit for obedience to the Almighty in doing what is blamed, as in effecting what is praised; would be guilty of as flagrant an act of rebellion in declining the task of evil as that of good set down for him, and leaves Heaven itself as exclusively accountable for the mischiefs of the moral world as for those of the mere physical creation—for the destruction effected by conquerors and statesmen, as for the havoc produced by earthquakes, floods, hurricanes, famine, and pestilence. To eat and to be eaten by each other is the lot which Providence itself has assigned to all the sentient inhabitants of this unhappy globe!”*

At this period of my reasoning, a new light burst upon me. All at once the great Author of all, so far from appearing, in his capacity of the sole primary cause of evil, as less bountiful to man, than if he had only been the artificer of good, seemed to acquire in my eyes, on that very account, a double claim to our gratitude. It struck me that, if the Omnipotent ordainer of the universe, who could have willed his work equally perfect throughout, had yet left for a time error and its bitter fruits mixed with knowledge and with bliss, this ordination might in reality lead to ultimate joys more intense than if all had been unmixed happiness from the very beginning. "Who, indeed," thought I, "dared, on mature consideration, to doubt, without calling in question both Almighty wisdom and goodness, that if, on this transient stage of mere trial and probation, God mingled weakness with strength, and darkness with light, so far from its being for the cruel purpose of throwing temptations into man's way, in order that he might punish him for yielding to their voice, and find reasons for only saving half mankind, where the whole might have been blessed, it was, in reality, only with the benevolent design of teaching all his creatures, through dint of a few fleeting injuries and sufferings, the eternal difference between evil and good, ignorance and knowledge, imperfection and endless unchanging perfection; and thereby enabling all, in their higher future state, to enjoy more completely, through the means of unceasing comparison, its good without evil, and its bliss without alloy."

On further reflection, however, I could not help finding, even in this sagacious scheme—liberal as it was—a something at which, I thought, a man in my predicament might still be dissatisfied. It still seemed to me that those ill-fated wretches whose misfortune it was to have been selected, even before their very birth, and wholly without their consent or foreknowledge, for the purpose of serving, through the mischiefs they were doomed to perform, and the miseries they were destined to suffer, as examples to the rest of mankind, might have reason to complain of partiality in the decrees of Providence, at least during its present provisional dispensations;—unless indeed, as seemed fair, those unfortunate evil-doers in this world were to be made amends for their sublunary hardships by an additional share of rewards and of glory in the next: but as that was still a doubtful point, and as, consequently, while I felt quite sure of being numbered here below among those pitiable victims forced to perform all manner of mischief for the general benefit, I possessed not yet the smallest certainty of an adequate compensation hereafter, I began by degrees to repine at my lot, to murmur at the mortifying part I was made to perform, and to lose what little patience my irksome task had thus far left me. In short, I determined no longer to forfeit the certain for the uncertain; but immediately to throw off my compulsory character, and—whatever punishment I might incur for my disobedience—forthwith to become a very pattern of virtue, in spite of heaven itself!

But, alas! I found there is no contending with the powers above; I soon discovered that the scheme which I was meditating is more easily planned than executed. Spiridion, whom till that moment I had looked upon as my good demon—as the angel appointed to guard me from evil—was in reality the spirit destined to scare me from good. Perceiving the strong labour in my mind, he lost his usual caution, and, in the mistaken idea of availing himself of the propitious moment, commenced so dark a picture of my vices, ere my virtuous resolves were well-matured, that my self-love—that infernal and ever-watchful sprite—suddenly felt alarmed, flapped its raven wings, and took the field. At once the current of the salutary reflections, spontaneously sprung up in my breast, became totally stopped by the fear lest my companion might think me subdued by a sense of my forlorn situation. Angrily interrupting his lecture, “I agreed,” cried I, “to the society of a friend, not to the admonitions of a preceptor. It is unfair to get me into a small boat out at sea, in order to pursue me with lectures from which I cannot escape!”

This sally, though it made Spiridion smile, still left me ruffled; and a little after, when my friend, after spreading out our little provision, looked for a knife, I offered him my handjar, still crimsoned with Aehmet’s blood. He said nothing, and only turned away his head. But as he leaned over the sides of the boat, I saw big tears drop into the waves. Night, meanwhile, had stolen on, and our little silent skiff, filled with mourning, and encompassed by darkness, looked like the barge which carries to the regions of wailing the souls of the damned.

The hours of darkness passed without further discourse; but early in the morning, Spiridion, thinking me more calm, ventured on what he called another appeal to my reason. The very word deprived me of what little I had left. “Appeal to my affections,” exclaimed I: “bid me do one thing or leave another for the love I bear you, but talk not to me of reason. I hold the cursed gift in abhorrence. It is the source of all our errors, the mother of all our mischiefs. The brute, who has only instinct to guide him, is sure to act right : but human beings, with their miserable reason, are always acting wrong, and acting wrong through the persuasions of that reason itself. For, if they are liable to evil passions of which brutes have no conception ; if they experience avarice, and ambition, and pride—those feelings most fertile in crimes and in havoc among the human species—to what do they owe this unfortunate distinction, but to the impulse of a reasoning faculty which happens to mistake its way ? And if they have been able to accomplish mischief beyond what brutes could have imagined ; if they have succeeded, for instance, to double on this globe, through such inventions as printing, cookery, and gunpowder, the three evils of infidelity, disease, and premature dissolution, what again have they to thank for the advantage but their inestimable reason ? It is, no doubt, in mercy to the human species, that of all its baneful faculties, that of reason, on which it prides itself most, should have been made to develop the last, and to slumber the oftenest.”

“I suppose, then,” said Spiridion, “it is only for fear of appearing too reasonable, that you, who do not think yourself accountable to Heaven, and, indeed, are not over-nice how you act by your neighbour, yet make your neighbour pay so dearly for any injury he may attempt to do you ?”

“Listen,” replied I : “As to the duties between man and man ; if my life or happiness depend upon the bread, or money, or jewel, which happen without my consent to be in my neighbour’s hands, assuredly I do not see why I should so far prefer his interests to my own as to leave them there, if I can do better for myself. Upon the same principle, I defend against my neighbours what I already have got ; and as I ward off impending injuries, so I retaliate injuries received, to prevent a repetition ; but in all this I feel no ill-humour towards my neighbour, allow him a complete reciprocity of rights against myself, and though I should even occasionally find it necessary to kill, in order to settle whose right shall prevail, I presume not to blame, and think myself not entitled to punish.”

“As soon,” answered I, “as by an express, or even tacit, but acknowledged agreement between certain individuals, each had ceded to the rest his natural indefinite right over their persons and properties, in return for other definite concessions, at once more restricted and more advantageous; and had voluntarily submitted to certain penalties on infringing this agreement."

"Well said!" exclaimed my friend; "you have described the social compact—the source of every law, the cement of every state; and, since you not only have acknowledged its sacredness, but subscribed to its terms, by claiming its support both as subject and as ruler, what more have you to do, but henceforth to abide, while this empire subsists, by all its stipulations?"

Here I rubbed my eyes. "Am I alive," cried I, "and awake; and do I hear a Greek, and under the yoke of the Turks, talk of a social compact—of an agreement intended for mutual benefit, support, and protection—as of a thing actually subsisting—as of a thing that should regulate his conduct to his masters? Ah! had I only discovered the faintest trace of any such agreement between Christianity and Islamism, and had I found in those for whose security it was framed the least disposition to enforce its terms and to resist its infraction, who would have been more proud than myself of remaining a Greek, of standing by my oppressed countrymen, and of maintaining the glorious struggle to the last drop of my blood! But it was because in these realms the contract, if ever it existed, had been perverted—or rather, had been torn, rent asunder, cast away! because my countrymen—as if fascinated by the despot's crooked cipher—had themselves preferred implicit submission to the restoration of an obliterated text; and because, not content with themselves going quietly to slaughter, when I claimed their defence, they only bade me do likewise, that, no longer either benefited or bound by the broken engagement, I left the community from which I in vain expected support, for that from which I hoped for effectual protection—until, equally disgusted with the brutal stupidity of the rulers as with the servile apathy of the ruled, and seeing in every system, whether of conquered or of conquerors, equal disorganization and ruin, I at last resolved to resume my rights of nature, and the primeval state of warfare against all worth attacking!"

Here Spiridion looked, or pretended to look, as if he thought he might be among those entitled to this dis-tion, and would now gladly have rid me of his company if he could. That being impossible, he vouchsafed to answer me. "Men," he cried, "so violently enamoured of their natural liberty, or rather license, should at once remove themselves from the pale of civil society; nor disturb those who are satisfied with what they disapprove."

"Spiridion," I replied, "that is easily said, but is it as easily done? Far as that society has spread its insidious snares, has it so much as left a single small spot on earth where those yet unborn who should dislike its partial regulations may find room to retire to the enjoyment of their birthright? Or if there be any such asylum remaining in the wilds of Tartary or the wastes of America, has not society, at any rate, so monopolized all the means of disentangling one's self from its mazes, as to render the gaining these blissful abodes next to impossible? Must we not possess land-caravans, or vessels, licenses and passports, even to fly to the loneliness of the desert, together with a strength of body and of mind of which the social institutions take care to deprive us ere we suspect their dangerous power? They cut our claws, they clip our wings, and then they cry out, with a smile of derision, 'Poor pinioned eagle, fly if thou list!' The man who is not wealthy can only escape from society through the gates of death. Nor does he every where, I am told, dare to approach even these boldly and honestly. He must in some countries smuggle himself out of the world by stealth, and embark for his journey under false colours, lest his body be made accountable for the roving disposition of his soul!"

In this sort of conversation did we while away our time in the boat. I knew that some of my arguments could not bear minute scrutiny; but I felt less solicitous to seek the shortest road to truth, as it must abridge our discussions, and leave us to all the irksomeness of a passage, which grew more tedious in proportion as our sentiments became less discordant.

CHAPTER XXVI.

AFTER a coasting voyage of three or four days, some ominous appearances in the sky made us veer about, and enter that most beautiful of harbours Port Caloné, on the island of Mytilene, where the olive-tree, growing almost out of the sea, again dips its pendant boughs in the briny tide which laves its knotty roots. "Had it not been written," exclaimed I, as we stepped ashore, "that this brain of mine should be stewing under a huge turban, instead of freely venting its superfluous heat from under a slight scull-cap, what a fine opportunity there would now be—midway as we are between the three hundred rich friars of Nea-Moni,* and the three thousand poor friars of Agios-Oros,—to turn thrifty myself, and exchange the thoughtless prodigality of the sinner, who stakes eternal happiness against a few years of jollity, for the calculating conduct of the saint, who inflicts upon himself just enough of privation and torture in this life to purchase a perpetuity of bliss hereafter;—or, again, had it been written that you should wear the turban as well as myself, how profitably we might spend our time in this boat, slashing our arms and legs in order to mix our blood, and ever after to be bound to each other both in body and soul, and sure of a companion in hell as in heaven. But I wrap my brains in muslin, and you in sheep-skin; and so our souls must—whether they choose or not—after they quit this frame, go miles asunder; and while they remain in these paltry bodies we have nothing to do—since we cannot pass our lives rowing through the Archipelago—but to consider how we may dispose of our persons to the best advantage, or at least where we may convey them with the least inconvenience."

"All this," said Spiridion, "I suppose, you are already fully determined upon, in your own mind."

"I am," was my reply; "but still I want your advice. You must know that in my humble opinion this eternal capitan-pasha, whom I am for ever talking of and waiting for, may be longer going to his new harvest-field, than my poor old father to his last home; and therefore, as we are approaching my native island, and the attraction begins to operate, I should like, wind and weather serving, with so many sins on my head, and so many enemies at my heels, to crave my sire's last forgiveness and blessing. It would lighten my burthen, and strengthen my soul, which sickens and wants such a cordial."

My motives for visiting the fior di levante* silenced all Spiridion's objections to going where he himself still had so many connexions. We agreed to cross the mountains which separated us from the town of Mytilene, and there to hire a swifter vessel for the remainder of our journey. Like Orestes, I was to wander about from place to place, trying to expiate my guilt, while Spiridion—my Pylades—had nothing to do but to watch me, in case I went mad.

Arrived on the quay of Mytilene's gay city, the first figure that struck me was a person, like myself, going to embark, of whom I thought I had some recollection. On closer examination I found him to be a gentleman from my native town; upon which I accosted him, and inquired the news of Chio. Eight or nine years had altered my features considerably more than his, of which the already long-fixed wrinkles had only acquired a little more depth and sharpness. He therefore answered me as a stranger. His account was not the less minute; but throughout the whole narrative not a syllable was mentioned of the only thing I cared about, namely, my own family, which somehow I had expected would have figured foremost. At last, losing all patience, "And Dimitri Sotiri," said I,—“what may he be doing at this time?”

“You come from distant parts, sir,” answered the gentleman, smiling agreeably; “otherwise you would know that Signor Sotiri has been dead this fortnight. I myself attended the funeral, and a noble one it was;—more sweetmeats consumed than at half-a-dozen weddings!—But you turn pale, sir! Is any thing the matter with you?”

* Fior di Levante—emphatic epithet of praise given by the Greek islanders to Chio.

"Nothing, nothing," cried I, trying to contain myself, "but a little giddiness to which I am subject;"—and laying hold of a post for my support,—“who,” resumed I, “carried the body?”

“His two sons, of course.”

“There was a third!”

“Ay, so there was;—and, though absent in person, present enough in name. Sotiri talked of no one else during his illness!”

“What was it he said?”

“Why, faith! that is what nobody can tell. Constantine and his brother maintained it was all raving.”

“Has that third brother been heard of?”

“Troth, people talk differently. Some say he is a great man—a bey of Egypt; others, a positive beggar at Constantinople. An acquaintance of mine, a man who seldom speaks any thing but the truth, swears he met him the other day in one of the streets of Galata, all in rags, and absolutely begging charity. My friend was going to give it in the shape of good advice, but the spark said that was not what he wanted, and turned away. As to his brothers, they report all that is bad of him. Their father never could silence their tongues; and though it is likely enough that all they say is true, yet everybody cries shame to hear people talk in that way of their own blood. It is what should be left to strangers. With the mischief they have made, it may be as much as his life is worth for Signor Anastasius, or Selim, as they call him, to show his face among us. The Turks’ fingers itch to throw the first stone at him as much as those of the Christians, although they say he is a hadjee, and has been to Mekkah. But none need fear his trying to come to Chio. I’ll lay my life on it he is dead long ago!”

“No,” exclaimed I,—as if suddenly awaking from a deep trance, and grasping the affrighted talker by the wrist,—“he is not! and since you are going to Chio, and may be glad to carry a piece of news, tell them Anastasius still lives; tell them they soon shall see him; and tell them he comes to resent his wrongs, and to claim his rightful property!”

Spiridion, alarmed at this sally, interrupted the conversation. Taking the Chiote by the left hand, while I still held him tight by the other, he pointed to his boatmen, who were making signs of impatience at his delay.

Nothing he wished for so much himself as to be gone. Disentangling his hands hastily from our grasp, he gave us an awkward half-strangled salutation, and sped to his barge.

As soon as he was out of hearing, "Is this," said Spiridion, shaking his head, "the way in which a son should mourn for his father?"

I could only stammer out,—“My brothers, my brothers!” Spiridion let the first emotions pass; and when he saw me more composed, spoke as follows:—

“I see, Anastasius, you still meditate some outrage; of what nature I know not, nor wish to hear. But of this I think it right to apprise you: if, impressed with a sense of all the forbearance you stand in need of yourself, you show equal lenity to your kindred; if, forgetting every injury, you only appear among them to speak words of peace; if, above all, you renounce every advantage bestowed by the partial laws of Islamism,—you have my friendship for ever: I bind my fate to yours until the hour of death. But if, on the contrary, you only return to your country to insult the ashes of your father, to devour the little substance of your brothers, and to justify the disgrace stamped in your birthplace on your name, I stay here, I leave you to run your race of shame alone, and I abandon for ever all solicitude about your welfare!”

“Spiridion,” answered I, “you know that covetousness is not the vice of my heart. But do you blame just resentment? do you wish calumny to remain unpunished?”

“And are you then so irreproachable,” asked the son of Mavrocordato, “as to leave so much room for injustice in the accounts concerning you, and to render every unfavourable representation of your proceedings an unbearable calumny? But, be that as it may, promise to do what I ask, or be content to see me withdraw on the spot from the pain of witnessing your future errors, and the disgrace of sharing in your yet unborn crimes.”

“I will not,” replied I, “bind myself by a promise. I should appear to have taken the engagement, unmindful of its weight, and only to fulfil reluctantly an irksome task because I had unguardedly pledged my word to perform it. I wish at least to acquire all the merit of acting right, by retaining the power of acting wrong. Only go with me as far as Chio. When there, if I should behave ill, it will then still be not too late to leave me.”

The look and manner with which I declined my friend's request inspired him with confidence. "Then once more go we on!" cried he; "but beware!"

I now strewed ashes on my turban, took the gloss off my glittering vest, and put on the signs of mourning. After this, we engaged another boat, and in a short time reached our destination.

There was no necessity in Chio to announce my arrival. On my very first landing I found every minor topic eclipsed by the more important subject of my speedy coming. Already had my brothers found means to stir up the whole town against me. Already was every inhabitant up in arms to prevent the renegade from reducing his nearest kindred to beggary. So loud was the cry of defiance, that on stepping ashore I found it expedient to go straight to the mekkimé. Safe in the hall of justice, I had my brothers summoned.

Spiridion did not know what to think of my proceeding. Questioned by his anxious looks, I made him signs to be silent: but though he unclosed not his lips, it was easy to see his heart trembled between hope and fear.

For my part, without giving the least hint of my intentions, without noticing the crowd collected to survey my person and to watch my behaviour, without satisfying the curiosity or correcting the errors of the bystanders, who aloud, at my elbow, imparted to each other their surmises, I stood haughty, unmoved, and silent, waiting the appearance of my worthy pair of brothers.

At last they made their entrance; and never certainly did men take less trouble to conceal the ill-humour they felt at seeing an unexpected relation. Without addressing me even in the words of anger, they went and took their station on one side of the hall, while I stood on the opposite side. There—pale, sullen, dejected, and now and then casting upon me a lowering look of mingled rage and despair—they awaited, without uttering a word, the legal injunction they expected, to surrender the paternal estate.

I own that for some time I enjoyed their dismay. It was the only pleasure they could afford me. Having indulged in it till the zest evaporated, I at last broke the long-protracted silence. "My brothers," said I, "you are aware of my claims upon you; and you likewise are conscious of your conduct to me. In your own minds, therefore, you dare not cherish the smallest particle of hope, that I should surrender in your favour any portion of my right. Yet what you dare not expect, I of my own accord perform. I here publicly relinquish my privilege. Take each your third of the paternal property; and only leave me that portion which would have belonged to me as a Christian, and which I can but ill spare. That done, mourn for your sins, and repent of your injustice."

To describe the effect these words produced on the audience would be impossible. Those who before considered me as a devil incarnate, now, of course, regarded me as an angel from heaven. The hall resounded with loud applause. Nothing was heard but praises of my generosity; and my brothers themselves, stunned by so unexpected a turn in their situation, were reluctantly forced to join in the general cry. They thanked me, but in such a way as made it doubtful whether they more rejoiced at recovering their property, or regretted retracting their abuse. I took no notice of their coolness, but went straight to our house. My progress looked like a triumphal march: all that had witnessed my behaviour at the mekkiené, and all whom we met on the way joined the procession. Having reached the steps of the mansion, I turned round and saluted the company. In its turn the assembly honoured me with fresh cheers, intermixed with a few observations on my brothers, which at least showed they were not overlooked. I expressed my unmixed gratitude, and retired to a private chamber, where I was glad to sit down and rest myself.

While every one else had been loud in praise of my conduct, the son of Mavrocordato alone had not uttered a syllable. As soon as we were by ourselves, he threw his arms round my neck, and attempted to speak: but in vain! His emotion was too great for utterance. He could only gaze on me with overflowing eyes. To see his Anastasius, who thus far had cost him nothing but anguish, had afforded him no employment but to conceal his errors, all at once become the theme of universal admiration; to find his friendship thus justified, his perseverance thus rewarded—what a moment for his feelings! Even while speechless for want of breath, his exulting look seemed to say, "Well, my friend, are you now sorry that you followed my advice?"

If, however, Spiridion's first thoughts were for his friend, his second were for his father. Till that moment, a more urgent subject of anxiety had occupied his mind.

This being set at rest, he took up the other. "Ah, my tender parent," exclaimed he, "why cannot you witness my success, or rather your own! For I act in your name; I but accomplish your vows. Alas! while I triumph, you still remain in anguish. Yet shall you not suffer longer than a grateful son can help."

Hereupon, he proposed to go out and inquire for the means of sending a letter. Already he had despatched a few lines from Rodosto to make his father easy respecting his disappearance. On my agreeing to the thing, we went forth. As we crossed the esplanade of the castle, I perceived a dark cloud gather on my friend's brow. His eyes seemed to dart out of his head, and to remain riveted on the quay. I turned mine the same way, but saw nothing to account for Spiridion's perturbation. At last, changing colour, and pressing my arm, "We are traced," he cried; "see Marco coming towards us!" This person was his father's steward—an old and confidential servant. "Let us go," rejoined he, "and meet him. I have done nothing of which I need be ashamed."

Marco saw his young master advancing. He hobbled on to meet him, and with a respectful salutation, presented a letter which he took out of his bosom.

Spiridion, with a trembling hand, broke the seal and read: then paused, ruminated, and read all over again. At last, trying to speak with more composure than he felt, "Your instructions, Marco," said he, "were to trace me, to follow me, and to hand me this letter. Your commission is performed. I have in great measure answered my father by anticipation from Rodosto: what remains I shall go and complete. I now am able to convey the welcome information, that the adopted brother whom he committed to my care is become worthy of his kindness, and, like me, only wants his prayers and his blessings."

"Sir," answered Marco, in a firm but respectful tone, "my instructions went farther than you state. I am bearer of letters to the despots,* and the proëstis of our different islands. They import that I am to see you safe home. But even had I not received express orders to that purpose, could I find the courage to reappear before your worthy parent, unaccompanied by the son he grieves for? Ah, sir, were you to see him! already his life hangs upon a thread. Seeing me return alone would certainly break his heart."

"Hark ye, Marco," replied Spiridion, pacing backward and forward in an agitation which almost bordered upon phrensy: "My father gave me a charge which he cannot at will recall. It was witnessed by Heaven, and was recorded by angels! In conformity with his solemn commands, and in compliance with my sacred promise, I have toiled at my task. God knows I have not spared myself. But on the eve of completion, I cannot, must not give up my work unfinished. On my head would lie, to the end of time, the sins of a brother unreclaimed. If, therefore, you urge me no further, but quietly return to Kandilly, I pledge my honour, nay, if you wish it, I take a solemn oath, that all on my part shall end to my father's satisfaction. If you refuse me, the soul I stand pledged for shall not be lost alone, two shall plunge together into ruin everlasting—I run to the first mosque, and whatever be the consequence—may it fall upon your head!"

"Sir," replied Marco, "I grieve at this issue of my commission; but the will of God be done! Many years have I lived under your kind roof, many an hour have I had you in my arms as an infant, as a child, as a boy. From the day on which you first lisped the feelings of your affectionate heart, to that on which you left your home, never have I known your promise fail. The word of Spiridion was always that of truth! I therefore submit. I return alone: yet may I hope you will deign to let me carry to your father a few lines of comfort from your beloved hands."

Spiridion, in running home to comply with the request, only performed what he already had promised. I, meanwhile, remained alone with Marco, and availed myself of the opportunity to question him respecting the reports of Kandilly. They were more satisfactory than I could have hoped.

When, on the morning after my departure, the son of the capidjee was found already taking his last sleep in the proper place, the public cemetery, no one suspected me of being the public benefactor who had introduced him to the silent, sedate sort of company in which he for the first time spent the night; inasmuch as he was notorious for his outrageous conduct, and at the time I met him had several other quarrels on his hands, much more public than the one for which he suffered: but everybody agreed, that whoever had taken the trouble of ridding the neighbourhood of the nuisance rather deserved thanks than blame. As to my disappearance, a sufficient cause for it was charitably found in the very natural wish of a needy adventurer to fleece a wealthy heir.

These particulars left me an opening to return to Constantinople whenever I liked. I ran to relate them to Spiridion, ere he concluded his letter; and they relieved his mind completely. He pledged himself soon to bring back to his father two sons instead of one; and on this assurance old Marco took his leave. I proceeded to settle with my brothers respecting the succession.*

Had I quietly stepped into an undisputed property, and found nothing to do but to mourn to my heart's content for the loss of a parent, I would have fulfilled to the utmost punctuality all the observances of grief. Sadness really possessed my soul, and I had constantly before my eyes my poor father in his illness, wishing to see his Anastasius, to forgive him, and to die in his arms; and perhaps in his last moments, and when I would have gone to the world's end for his blessing, pierced to the heart by exaggerated accounts of my unfeeling and incorrigible profligacy. But if mere business accords but ill with sorrow, nothing is so sure to drive melancholy away altogether as strife and bickerings; and my brothers were much too considerate not to afford me every distraction of this sort which they could think of. Theirs was a malice which no kindness of mine could assuage; and the moment my formal renunciation of their portions made them conceive all cause either for hope or fear on my score at an end, their ill-concealed hatred again broke out in all its pristine virulence. They not only cavilled about every most trifling article of the property, they even attempted to deprive my conduct of all its little merit, by roundly asserting that I had only acted from pusillanimity, and sacrificed a part to make sure of the remainder. Constantine was the leader in every altercation. Eustathius, more indolent, contented himself with giving his unlimited approbation to whatever his brother (and that meant Constantine alone) thought proper to do.

Thus were all the ancient wounds afresh torn open and made to fester. Spiridion tried in vain to interpose. He only got for his trouble taunts from his antagonists, and reproaches from me. "Why had he meddled at all?

Why had he made it a point with me to behave kindly to unnatural brothers, whose injustice, but for his interference, would have met with its deserts."

And yet, notwithstanding my murmurings, did I to a certain degree restrain myself; not from any real moderation, but from the wish that my assumed forbearance might encourage my adversaries to so extreme a pitch of ill conduct, as to render their provocations evident to all the world, and to justify any step prompted by my legitimate resentment. Nor did this period seem far distant. Whether from an idea that they had daunted me by their haughty tone, or from an absolute intoxication of brutality, they by degrees cast away all pretensions of decency. The more I forced myself to appear calm and composed, the more they increased in the grossness of their insults.

All wondered at my patience; all beheld me with admiration. When my brothers allowed themselves every license of language—almost every latitude of gesture—all stared to see me content myself with turning up my eyes to heaven like a saint cast among savages. Even those least acquainted with the irascible temper I had to restrain cited me on this occasion as a perfect model of meekness and forbearance. He only who with unwearied vigilance watched each change of my countenance, and could penetrate each emotion of my heart, was not to be deceived. One day, when Constantine even exceeded his usual insolence, and I my customary forbearance, I caught him expressing, by an almost imperceptible shake of the head, his distrust of my tranquillity. His suspicions were spoken too intelligibly for me to pass over. "What do you fear," cried I, as soon as my brothers were out of hearing; "do you not see me laugh at their meanness?" "Ah!" replied Spiridion, fetching a deep sigh, "you may laugh with your lips; but laughter reaches not your eyes, and fell resentment rankles in your heart."

My friend was right. Suppressed anger had already curdled my blood, and clogged the whole circulation of my humours. Ere yet he had done speaking, a sudden shivering rushed through my frame—my teeth began to chatter, and my limbs to shake. In an instant all my strength seemed to forsake me.

Since my sojourn at Chio I had resumed my old travelling custom of carrying my pistols duly loaded in my belt. Many in Turkey always wear them thus when out of the capital. As they now impeded my breathing, I took them out, and laid them on the sofa. Scarce was I disencumbered of my weapons, when my knees began to tremble, a dark curtain seemed to drop over my eyes, and I fell senseless on the couch.

I continued some time bereft of all perception. On its return I found myself stretched out at full length where I had fallen, with all the accompaniments of one duly convicted of a decided and lasting illness. A regular physician of the place was feeling my pulse, and going to pronounce on my case; and as my first return to my senses was marked by a fierce struggle with my Esculapius, I was at once judged to be in a violent delirium, and in imminent danger. Sentence was pronounced accordingly, and every internal medicine and every external application prescribed which could torture the human body and stomach. All the bystanders conceived me in the agonies of death, and civilly expressed their regret at the short stay I made among them.

To myself these politenesses seemed premature. The sudden transitions from heat to cold, the suppressed perspiration, the fatigue of body and the anxiety of mind during the journey were quite sufficient, in my own opinion, to bring on a strong paroxysm of fever, without death being the necessary consequence. I however deemed it expedient to assent to all the doctor said, in order that he might say no more. It afforded Spiridion an excuse for turning out the company, and procuring me a little quiet. He alone staid to nurse me.

"What a pity," muttered I to myself, when I thought no one heard me, "that that last dose of the English powders of mine should have been wasted in Egypt on that traitor my father-in-law." Spiridion lost not a syllable of the soliloquy. "There are foreign vessels in the harbour," he cried. "Possibly they may have some;" and he immediately ran out to inquire.

Meanwhile my brothers had received from the departed visitors the agreeable intelligence of my being at the last gasp. They hastened up to me, eager with curiosity and hope; and finding my door ajar and unguarded, slipped in with the least possible noise. I however had discerned their steps on the stairs, and immediately—before they entered the room—assumed the appearance of one in the act of resigning his last breath. Constantine was the first to approach. On tiptoe he came to my bedside in order to ascertain whether his joy was well founded, ere he gave it full scope. With that laudable view he examined me most minutely from head to foot, raised and let fall my arms and legs, moved his hand before my eyes, put his ear to my mouth, first addressed me in a low whisper, then audibly, then shouting with all his might, as if he suspected I might be playing him a trick.

Most manfully did I stand the whole ordeal. Nothing could make me wince or move a muscle; and my affectionate brother at last acquired the grateful conviction, that if not quite dead yet, I had at least already lost all perception, and could not fail soon to depart for ever. He no longer delayed conveying the agreeable intelligence to the discreet Eustathius, who, the hindmost on all other occasions, on this also had not ventured beyond the door, and there stood, in breathless expectation, waiting the result of the scrutiny; and perhaps also watching the condition of the outposts."

"Stathi," said Constantine, with a sort of subdued exultation, "there is some warmth still about him—but depend upon it he cannot last!"

"Ah!" exclaimed the wary Stathi, shaking his head, "worse than he, I fear, have recovered!" and he fetched a deep sigh at the thought!

"True," answered Constantine; "and as we are alone, and have every presumption in our favour, why not make sure work, and crush the snake at once!" And so saying, he laid his hands on my throat, and attempted to strangle me.

This was doing things in a grand style! Not stopping at half measures. I conceived for my brother a veneration unfelt before, almost thought it a pity to interrupt him in his spirited proceeding, and would have let the farce go on, could I, at its conclusion, have revived at my own pleasure. That not being the case, I was reluctantly forced to notice the intended favour, and, weak as I felt, to defend myself as well as I could against my two stout assailants; for Stathi too now advanced to lend a hand; and it was evident, that having once begun, they would not, if they any way could help it, leave their work unfinished.

My firearms lay concealed, but within reach. With one hand I seized Constantine's wrist, and with the other a pistol,—“Ah brother! ah fiend!” I cried—and fired.

Never yet had I missed my aim, even when I held not my prey in my grasp. But at my first sign of life Constantine had started, and, content to leave his jubbee in my possession, had disengaged his person. My hand, besides, trembled with the effects of the fever—perhaps even with some instinctive sense of the dire office it was performing, and—the miscreant only received the ball in his shoulder.

Uttering a dreadful yell, he made a spring at the door, and darted out. Ere I could find my other pistol, Eustathius too had made good his retreat. Both were out of sight in an instant, but not out of hearing. My ears bore witness to Stathi's stumbling down stairs, with such violence and outcry, as to make me entertain hopes that neither of them had entirely escaped the merited retribution.

As soon as, after a few dying murmurs, all was again hushed in silence—"Now," thought I, "for the tête-à-tête with Spiridion! According to custom, he will lay the whole blame on me. He will deem my good brothers' intentions all very wise and proper; will see much sound reason in them, and will not be content, I suppose, until I go to them with a halter round my neck, beg pardon for my impatience in stopping their proceedings, and humbly supplicate them to put their design into execution!"

Meanwhile, the report of the pistol had a second time collected the whole neighbourhood round my door. But, if pronounced delirious before, I now was supposed to be under the influence of a phrensy so outrageous, that no one durst step across my threshold. The curious contented themselves with forming a blockade outside the room, each holding himself in readiness to fall back, and to shove his neighbour in his place, should I make an unexpected sally.

This state of things continued until Spiridion's return. His expedition had been unsuccessful. When he appeared, so many officious friends sprung forward to tell him what had happened in his absence, that it would have been utterly impossible for him to understand a single word of the matter, supposing even that the relaters themselves had known the truth. But my brothers, to whom they were indebted for all their information, had, in their hurry, dropped the trifling circumstance of their attempt upon my life, in which the affair began. Despairing, therefore, to make any thing of the confused and contradictory accounts with which he was stunned, Spiridion at last pushed aside the crowd, and, to the utter astonishment of all, entered my room undaunted and alone!

He found me seated on the sofa, with my face in my hands, and my elbows on my knees, overwhelmed more with disappointment than with shame, and incapable either of raising my eyes or of unclosing my lips. Thus I remained, wholly unmindful of his entrance, until, after some time contemplating me in silent earnestness, he at last took a seat beside me, and spoke.

"Selim," said he, "am I to believe these people? are you really out of your mind; or rather, as I apprehend, perfectly in your senses?"

"In my perfect senses," answered I, with all the composure of which I was master. "My hand was raised to punish demons. This time they have escaped!—But what is not yet, may be!"

"Never, never," cried he, "while I have life.—Rather than that you should hurt your brothers, my breast shall interpose."

"Then through your breast," I exclaimed, "must I strike them."

Spiridion here rose. "Anastasius," said he, calmly, "I feel but little wish to live: not however at thy hands must I receive my death-blow! My bosom may be pierced by thy speech, but let it remain sacred from thy sword. The world must not have it to say that thou couldst plunge thy dagger into the heart of thy friend. The crime would be as idle as it would appear heinous. If my presence be a burthen to thee, say but the word, and I go."

"I never desired you to stay," cried I, in a sullen tone.

"Very well," rejoined Spiridion. "You speak plain.

Yet, ere I act accordingly, once more, and for the last time, I appeal from Anastasius blinded by passion to Anastasius restored to reason. In an hour hence I return and repeat the same question. If the answer be the same—then farewell, and for ever!"

At these words Spiridion went out, and tranquillized the gentlemen drawn up in the passage with respect to my situation. On my friend's assurances they all rushed in, and teased me with so many questions, and with so much advice, that they almost made me lose the little wits I had left. Their annoyance still lasted, when, at the expiration of the hour, Spiridion returned. Without seeking it, he had gained so universal a sway by his dignified demeanour, that at his desire all retired. The room being cleared of strangers, he took me by the hand, and finding that the symptoms of bodily disorder had subsided, he looked sternly in my face, and spoke thus:

"This, Anastasius, is at last the moment which must decide my resolution. The solemn vow is irrevocably spoken; and according to what you now answer, I may stay, or I must leave you for ever. Do you swear by all that is holy to renounce your impious revenge, or do you prefer to be released from my society?—If the last, utter not, I beseech you, the ungracious word. Only withdraw your hand."

Undoubtedly this would have been the moment for thoroughly explaining the business with my brothers, of which my friend knew but half, and of which that half more than doubled my guilt. Not aware that my own life had been attempted first, and ignorant that I acted in my own defence, Spiridion considered my illness as a pretence, or, at any rate, my firing as a premeditated scheme. It would have been easy to remove his error:—had not my bare word sufficed, Constantine's torn garment would have borne witness to the struggle. But after my solemn promise at Mytilene, I considered the bare suspicion as so injurious to my honour, that my offended pride forbade my undeceiving my friend or clearing my character. I pulled away my hand, and Spiridion walked out.—Yet, God knows, I did not wish to lose him!

As soon as he had left me, I paced up and down the room with a hurried step. After a few turns I went out to fetch breath on the quay. An hour's air and exercise changed the current of my ideas. I felt regret for my obstinacy, and fear of its consequences. With the utmost speed I ran home, and up to Spiridion's chamber.

He was closing his portmanteau. The things about the floor had disappeared. All looked empty, orderly, and desolate.

"What means this?" cried I, affecting more surprise than I felt.

"Only," replied Spiridion, "that what I said, I do."

"Ah, my friend, my real brother," exclaimed I, "do you then, in sad earnest, purpose to leave me? Cursed be my tongue, which uttered what my heart had no share in; and cursed be my hand, which confirmed the untruths of my tongue!"

"Anastasius," now said Spiridion, seating himself upon his little bundle, "fancy not your last words and actions to have been the sole and primary cause of a long-formed and long-resisted resolution. Its origin dates far higher. The unkind speeches and gestures of this day only gave the final impulse!"

"From children we were brothers in love. When you rescued me from death, the day that all our companions stood palsied by fear, gratitude only riveted affliction's prior links; and duty, I hoped, had rendered them indissoluble, when my father himself named you his second son! Many years his commands of fraternal kindness to his Spiridion's preserver remained without fruit. You yourself best know how. Yet was the deep-rooted attachment of childhood never replaced by more recent friendships; and when I again beheld you at Constantinople, my feelings for my Anastasius still preserved all their freshness unfaded. Evil inclinations of no ordinary magnitude, indeed, I saw mixed with your better qualities; but I thought that, if freed from their alloy, your virtue too would eclipse ordinary virtue; and I imagined an unbounded devotion might enable me to become the instrument of so noble a reformation. I undertook the task. I resolved to save from perdition your soul, as you had saved my body; and I prayed the Almighty to bless the undertaking. Some return on myself also, some selfish feelings perhaps were mixed with my wishes for your welfare. I could not help fancying that, regenerated through me, you would become my support and my consolation in the irksome race I am destined to run; that, in your turn, you might assist me in the struggles and dangers that strew the rugged path through which I am destined to journey. In short, I hoped that, each blest in the other, we should toil through life together, and that when shone forth our last day, whichever was summoned first should only die in the other's loved arms. Great as were the pains you took to expose my presumption and to dispel my foolish dream, long did my soul firmly cling to its fond chimera; long did my heart hug it as a thing too precious to part with!"

"But there are lights that even strike the blind. Reluctantly, though irresistibly, I have at last been forced to see that no arguments, no persuasion, no labour of mine have power to control the passions which enslave you; and that, however I may strive, I still must leave you ungovernable, and you still must leave me wretched as before. Much as I tried to avert my eyes from the fatal truth, I have at last yielded to the painful conviction that, sooner or later, we still must end in separating for ever; and that, by trying to put off the evil day by struggling for a short and transient respite, I can only at last drink the cup with greater bitterness. I therefore submit to the decrees of Heaven: I bow to the will of Providence in flying from thee, as I erst hoped to fulfil it by following thy footsteps. In sadness I go; but I go, and for ever! Far from thee I henceforth shall live; and far from thee it will be my fate to die! Yet, Selim, thou art young still. What the anxious warnings of friendship could not perform, the leaden hand of time may achieve. It may allay the ferment of thy passions, clear away the impurities of thy heart, and—though I shall not witness the blissful change—still make thee great and virtuous. This happy consummation God in his goodness grant!”

“Ah, Spiridion,” cried I, clasping my friend in my arms, “you cannot, you shall not leave me thus!” But he, fearing his own weakness, in order to render a relapse impossible, “On my head be God’s eternal curse—be that of my aged father!” he exclaimed, “if I do not immediately return to my paternal roof!”

I now felt all remonstrance to be fruitless. “You are right,” replied I. “The game could not go on between us. The stakes were not even. Loaded with the gifts of Providence, and accountable to your fellow-creatures for their use, you may not squander your ample means on a barren soil, nor seek ruin with a reprobate whom you cannot save. Yet, if once Anastasius did possess your love, and still returns all your affection; if that wretch, that reprobate, in the midst of all his errors, never ceased to reverence your virtues; if his spirit, undaunted by all else, stooped to you, and worshipped you alone—Oh, Spiridion, listen! At present that, bereft of all hope, indeed, weaned of all wish to hear a sentence repealed on which depends your peace, he for ever renounces the happiness of your society, nay, urges you himself to fly his baneful presence; at least grant this only last request—grant what he who never yet humbled himself before mortal man implores of you on his bended knee: tell him—lay this unction to his sickening soul to know—that you do not hold him in utter detestation!—that on leaving him to return no more, you at least feel a pang; and when—all earthly things gone by like unsubstantial shadows—comes the day of your reward in heaven for the good deeds done on this earth—when, before the throne of Mercy, arrayed in all your worth, you receive your well-earned meed of ineffable joy, cast back one look of pity on the wretch who, overwhelmed by the weight of his guilt, sinks while you rise to glory. Speak for him to your Maker one poor word of intercession: and beg he may not fall so low in the abyss of wretchedness, but that from an immeasurable distance he still may behold and be consoled by your bliss!"

"If at any time here or hereafter," cried Spiridion, "I forget you, may Heaven forsake me!" and bending down his head, he wept aloud.

After some time he rose up, and wiping away his tears, "I have made you," said he, "a promise to hold good for eternity; now make one in your turn to last only a short space of time."

"Any you please," I answered.

"What a temptation that!" rejoined my friend.—"But I shall not abuse your confidence. I shall not ask what you cannot perform. It was only a trifling favour I wanted for mutual mitigation of pain. Take this watch," he added, giving me the one he wore; "and count just twenty minutes ere you stir from this spot."—Saying which, he took up his parcel, and walked to the door. I tried to remonstrate and to stop him; but gently pushing me aside, "You have promised," he cried, and instantly disappeared.

I ran after my friend as far as my pledged honour would permit—to the threshold of my room, and there called him back with loud and repeated cries; but in vain! Spellbound by my promise, I stood motionless on the utmost verge of my apartment, with ears stretched out to catch each fleeting sound, and eyes riveted on the hands of my watch. At first I perceived some commotion, some distant bustle in the house, some running backward and forward; but very soon all these noises sunk away in a dreary and lasting silence. Yet were there several long minutes wanting of the point marked on the inexorable dial for my release. Each of these appeared an entire age, composed of many lesser periods of endless duration; and all the time I kept my eyes straining on the figures, as if my bare look could quicken by its motion the impulse of the hands. At last they approached the goal, glided over the last second, and attained the long-wished-for term! I now dart forward like an arrow: I run, I leap, I fly; first, through the house from room to room; next, on finding all deserted within, out into the street, and lastly to the quay.

There I perceive nothing but an indifferent and gaping crowd, which my eyes in vain interrogate, and which gives me no satisfactory answer. Wherever I look no Spiridion appears!

Fearfully I at last cast my eye on the wave; and after an anxious search among the shipping in the road, spy, already far away, a small caïck, which, with stress of sails and oars, seems steering towards Tchesmé. A young man, I was told, for whom the caïck lay waiting, had been seen to step in, with his face wrapped in his shawl; and immediately the boat was pushed off, and cleft the billows with such speed as already to appear little more than a mere speck.

The young man was Spiridion—and my first impulse to go after him. I called for another barge; but while it was preparing, thoughts more sober drove away my first design.

Why, in fact, follow a friend determined to fly from me!—Was not his purpose irrevocably fixed? Went he not back to his father and his home? Was he not right in doing so? Did not the happiness of his life depend upon this measure? was I to impede his progress or to increase his parting pangs, and that from a mere selfish feeling? For what now could he gain by aught that I could say or do?

Immediately I gave up the short-lived project, and having paid for the trouble I occasioned, walked away, and sought on the beach a more retired spot in which to vent my sorrows. Distracted by so many opposite feelings that I scarce seemed to feel at all, I threw myself on the ground, and moistened with my tears the sand on which I lay.

“All now,” cried I, “to me is at an end; my abode is become a desert, my life a scene of solitude, my very existence a blot in the creation!”—and hereupon I struck my breast, until, exhausted by my grief, I grew somewhat more quiet, and began my song of sorrow.

In the midst of my melancholy ditty, I remembered that, together with his watch, Spiridion had slipped into my hands a pocket-book, which, not knowing what to do with, I had thrust into my bosom. I now pulled out the toy. It might contain some farewell token; some last and sacred behest.

A few words had indeed been written on one of the leaves, but had been rubbed out again. The only uncanceled manuscript I could find, and to which the case seemed intended as a vehicle, was a loose slip of paper, an order to the bearer—but to what amount I know not: for without looking at the figures I tore the draft to pieces, and scattered the useless fragments in the wind. No sooner, however, had I done so, than I regretted my precipitation. The sum was nothing! I never meant to claim it; but the last signature of my friend in my behalf—what to me could be equally precious? As of many other things, however, I felt its value when too late! Already had the surf washed away the last remnant of the paper.

I now pressed to my lips the empty book. "Last remembrance," exclaimed I, "of a friend for ever lost, be thou my sole unceasing companion. Lie ever next my heart. Continue its ægis against all evil passions. Preserve me henceforth, not from grief, but from sin!"

This said, I started up, and left the lonely spot: but as I returned among the bustling throng, my sadness increased. Why did I any longer tarry in my native land? How could I face my countrymen, abandoned as I was by my friend? "Ah," cried I, "since I have him no more to guide and to support me, let me fly from Chio as from the place of my shame. Let me seek refuge in Egypt, at Algiers, in France—or wherever else men acquire fame by destroying each other! There let me in the din of arms forget friendship's silenced voice—there pass my days in strife—there conquer, or there die!"

Conformably to this resolution, I determined not to stay for the completion of the settlement with which had commenced my worst misfortune, but left my full powers with a friend, or, in other words, sold my birthright to a schemer for an immediate sum. The same act rid me of my troubles, and began those of my brothers: a circumstance which they probably only learned after my departure, as in consequence of their ill-fated attempt, both kept their beds; not entirely from choice, however, —Constantine having got a broken arm in the conflict, and Eustathius a dislocated hip. These were the only incidents which gave me any comfort.

As for me, I took my passage to Cyprus, where I thought I might join the Turkish fleet in its way to Egypt; and in the act of embarking, called down upon my head the utmost wrath of Heaven, if ever I set foot on my native land again.

Spiridion, by the way of Smyrna, speedily reached his home, and his father's longing arms. Whether from fatigue or from mere disappointment, he fell into a state of languor, which long threatened a fatal termination. But time and corporeal debility at last blunted the sting of mental suffering. Insensibly health returned, and with health, a calm hilarity. The youth then resumed, never more to abandon it, the steady regular mode of life which only for my sake had been interrupted. In good time he married a young lady of noble blood and distinguished beauty, and became the happy father of a lovely family.

Mavrocordato, as observed before, had destined his son to run the perilous race of ambition; and, had he never known the fear of losing that darling son, would with difficulty have been diverted from his purpose. But while Spiridion's fate hung suspended between life and death, his father too strongly felt the blessing of his existence, and the value of his happiness, any longer to stake them against perilous honours, difficult to attain, and hollow when possessed. His desires became sobered, and his views less aspiring: he determined to prefer the certainty of his son's bliss to the probable misery of his grandeur; and vowed, so Heaven but left him his child, never more to abuse a father's authority, by goading him on to dangerous distinctions. Thence, indeed, Mavrocordato obtained not, like the Giecas, the Callimackis and others, the advantage of boasting that their nearest of kin had been bowstrung on a throne; but this misfortune he bore with becoming resignation. As to Spiridion, content to move in the sphere of a wealthy merchant, he employed his daily growing riches in diffusing around him happiness and prosperity. His life resembled the course of a majestic stream, whose deep but tranquil waters, winding their ample way through fertile plains and flowery meads, as they advance still receive from new rills fresh increase, while at each step also they bestow more profusely all the fruits of industry, and all the blessings of plenty.

Far different was the similitude borne by my roving life. Seeking my fortune in strife, not in harmony; making havoc, not culture, the means of my support; and engaged, not in the steady pursuit of a regular profession, but in a wild, wandering flight from one career to another; sometimes prosperous and oftener unfortunate; now in unavailing plenty, and now again in pinching want; I at best resembled the blustering mountain torrent, which, only acquiring might and substance during the war of elements, as soon as they cease their strife, again subsides in a mean rill; in times of serenity shows no trace of its existence, save in the havoc of darker days brought to light; and so far from in its fulness diffusing more benefits than in its penury, only effects greater mischief as it receives ampler supplies. While still near its source in the upper regions of the globe, this ill-favoured offspring of the clouds, hurried over fell and precipice, only offers a succession of fierce struggles, furious falls, and impracticable shallows; when farther advanced in its impetuous career, and rushing with tremendous roar into the fertile plain below, it seems indeed determined to make itself amends for the restraint which it experienced; it disregards all rights, destroys all property, and levelling fence and boundary, annihilates crops, habitations, and life: but throughout the whole of its wild and uncertain progress, from where it first bubbles up near the sky, to where it finally plunges into the vast abyss of the deep, it equally remains a curse to the region it pervades!
